Contour Strip Farming 385 acre field on the C. A. Nish farm, 20 miles south of Arlington, Oregon, Gilliam county. Wheat-fall strips are 180 feet in width. Crested wheat grass (appearing light in picture) are at least 30 feet wide.

Soil Contouring Tried Now In Gilliam County

C. A. Nish, operator of a large wheat ranch located about 30 miles south of Arlington, in Gilliam county, has demonstrated on a 385 acre field that contour strip farming saves soil and generally fits this large wheat operation which derives some income from livestock, but principally from wheat.

The above pictured field held the soil during the heavy cloud-burst last summer and has also held the soil during several runoff periods. The field is laid out with 180 foot strips, showing dark in the picture with 30 foot or more correction guide strips of crested wheat grass between. The 180 foot strips are all in one year and follow the next, this makes it possible to graze the grass every other year. This system of farming will fit nicely into a crop rotation when established on the ranch. The wheat stubble is all returned to the soil near the surface and with contour seeding and tillage, this field is protected from erosion better than most of the sloping lands in the Columbia basin.

More and more, farmers are convinced it takes several conservation practices on a field to hold the soil, according to District Conservationist Ramon L. Kent, of Pendleton, Oregon. The grass strips are usually clipped with mower to keep down weeds and make the crested wheat grass more palatable to livestock and to provide ground mulch of grass stubble to hold the soil or water if any should move from cultivated strips. The grass can be used for pasture, seed production or for hay.
