NO BUTTER SUBSTITUTE

Some say there is no real substitute for butter, but if one has to do without there are palatable foods that supply many of the food elements, reminds Miss Lucy Case, extension nutritionist at OSC. If homemakers really want vitamin A, she explains, they can get it by eating more green and yellow vegetables, which in addition give a person vitamin C to help prevent sore joints, vitamin G for long life and iron for good health.

Cream is available to be used as a seasoner to make many dishes richer without butter. For example, suggests Miss Case, there is a tasty scalloped dish using canned corn, crackers, seafood and seasoning. Ordinarily milk and butter are added, but part milk and part cream will result in the same richness.

Brown gravy with pork chops or other meat will take the place of butter on bread. Jams and jellies as well as honey are all cover-ups for hot breads. For a sturdier breakfast she recommends French toast by dipping egg and frying it.

Cheese, which contains calcium and vitamin A, is another excellent way to substitute for butter. A medium white sauce with melted cheese, a little catsup, paprika or onion will spice up toast, muffins, hot biscuits and potatoes, continues Miss Case.
