Veterans Shou'd Get Power Back

Veterans who assigned powers of attorney for the handling of personal and financial affairs during their time in active service should be cautioned that these powers remain in effect until action is taken to revoke them, an Oregon banking official told the state Department of Veterans' Affairs today.

This word was from Donald W. McKay, trust officer for a large Oregon bank, who said that in many instances the veteran did not intend these powers to remain in force after his return home, but that he may have neglected to cancel the authority.

Whoever holds the papers designating power of attorney—whether a bank, an attorney, a county court, or other agent—should be notified by the veteran that he wishes to revoke the power, and wants the papers returned to him. This can be done in writing, except where the papers are recorded by the county.

In the latter instance, a notarized statement of revocation should be filed with the county clerk for recording.
