WHY SO MANY?

The number of deaths over each American holiday should scare us into carefullness. But they do not. Is it possible that the percentage of those killed compared to those traveling is larger or smaller than it was a few years ago?

The city people seem to pitifully anxious to get outside the bounds of city streets and away from the petty rules that must be enforced when they are crowded together, that they become reckless. The view of an open road unhampered by constant traffic and bordered by fields instead of houses causes them to push on the throttle and go, go, go, until their path is a dangerous one.

It must be remembered that many of these city people were born in the country where there was a summer sun without the brassiness of smoke filter, where work could be done at a time and place suited to the individual and not of a factory whistle. They were once individuals who could make their own decisions.

The return to that after months of doing the bidding of bosses, foremen, labor leaders, policemen, bus drivers and all the mutiplicity of men in the city who are empowered to say "Yes" and "No" to the average run of citizens, is enough to make the city dweller a little more susceptible to the dangers of speed.

FLOWER GARDENS

There is a street in Moro that is bright with red poppies and blue bachelor buttons and every time its blooms come into view they call to mind how styles have changed in flowers as in everything else.

There was a time when it was not considered easy to raise them in this part of the state and when there was little time to spend on rather frivolous things like flowers. There were chickens to keep the housewife busy and a few cows for the family milk and whatever other time was available could be more profitably spent hoeing the corn than frittering time away with posies, however decorative.

But there were flowers in gardens even in that more rugged era. There were the same poppies and bachelor buttons and a vivid orange California poppy that somehow has been ostracized from gardens these days. And then there was the ubiquitous yellow rose that was so hardy that bushes still mark the site of homestead cabins long since forgotten. Occasionly there were some of the native wild roses brought in from some damp spot, where they flourished, to sweeten the air about the farm yard.

These days we've gone modern and our flower gardens are filled with pampered little plants that couldn't have stood a single day in the sun soaked garden grandma tended. If one wished to draw a moral he might say that our flowers have lost the pioneer stamina as well as those who tend them. A wild rose in the yard and a yellow rose climbing over the front porch and a handful of poppy seed would choke out these puny delphiniums and peonies and gladioli in a single season and be beautiful doing it.

BRANNAN PLAN

New interest in the Brannan plan was aroused this week when it was discussed at the grange meeting in Ontario where the grangers decided that it was not for Oregon. California, it was said, is the only state where the grange has approved it.

The Brannan plan is a political move that appears to have been designed to aid consumers and to turn aside some of the criticism leveled at the present farm program. Certainly it has political appeal. The labor organizations approve it fully— and should. It would lower the cost of farm produce to the market level and then the government would pay the farmer enough to bring his total income up to a previously determined price for the product involved. If there was a surplus of any product the consumer would fare well—fine in fact.

Neither would the farmer care much whether he met the demands of the nation or not. He would get paid anyhow. All of them might grow the easier crops and refuse to tend row crops. It would be hard to differentiate for quality of crops.

There is a provision that would limit the income of farm subsidy to 1800 units that are carefully defined. This would keep farm income down and prevent anyone on a large farm from getting much subsidy which would probably put the larger farmer out of business entirely. In fact, that is held up as one of the desirable features of the bill by advocates of the "family" sized farm.

Mr. Brannan is a lawyer who grew into his job without much experience in agriculture. He is a much better politician than farmer and his bill shows it. As he came from Colorado he should realize that economically speaking there is much more efficiency in producing some crops on large acreages. His plan would take away the efficiency whereunder the wheat men of the nation have produced grain cheaper than ever before despite the general inflation.

In these days when government is getting bigger and bigger, when industry is consolidating for strength, when labor unions are so united that there are but two main ones it seems utterly foolish to pass any legislation that will condemn the farm to a petty income and uneconomic practices. It would be as foolish to make a law permitting General Motors to make no more than 1000 cars and labor unions restricted to 50 members.

The Brannan plan would be damaging to American agriculture, would be costly in operation, would make the farmer a serf of the state and aid the consumer in the name of farm legislation. It is not for us.
