MORE INTENSIVE TO AG PROBLEM

"Two blades of grass where only one grew before" may be a solution to one of Oregon's mounting farm production problems.

More intensive production must come from the state's 5,000,000 acres of plow land if farm output is to keep pace with increased demand created by swelling population, said Ed McCause, La Grande, at the recent statewide agricultural conference held on the Oregon State college campus. He was chairman of the conference soil and water resources committee.

McCause said the state's agriculture is based on from 4,500,000 to 5,000,000 acres of plow land. There is little prospect of increasing that acreage.

"Demand on this limited area of cropland is real. The effect on the individual farm is becoming only too apparent," he said. "The cost of owning land in purchase price, taxes and interest is mounting. These are accompanied by increased material, labor and supply costs. The individual farmer, by necessity, faces the problem of increasing the volume of business from the same acreage—so it is for the state as a whole."

The committee which McCause headed pointed out ways through which a production increase could take place during the next 15 or 20 years.

By bringing an additional 800,000 acres under irrigation in the Willamette valley.

Extend water supplies in eastern and southern Oregon to benefit 1,000,000 acres either through better supplies on land now irrigated or to land now dry farmed. Improve 800,000 acres of land by drainage.

Step up production 25 to 50 per cent by intensive and proper use of commercial fertilizers. Double production from 500,000 acres of wild meadow hayland.
