Crowds, People, Folks, and are glad. agement keeps things humming so fast there's little time for conversation.

Did you ever stop to think how much they add to a fair? And chances are he's saying the same thing about you.

Sure you go to look at the fat calves but what you talk about when home again is who you saw at the fair. "Looks pretty good, too, for an old duffer," you say talk. In the afternoons the man-

A fair is a comfortable place to meet folks. They can sit and talk or stand and talk. That is during the forenoons one can talk. In the afternoons the man-

Humans are a gregarious race. That is, they like each other. They like to be together and talk and tell each other about their troubles (try on each other's shoulder) or their victories (bragging like a strutting gander) or just exercise their English without any particular motive. Oh, now and then you see a lonesome sort of a gent who doesn't have much to say, but he probably feels worse about it than anyone else. And like as not he'd talk an ear off if you found his favorite subject.

Most people talk. And the only complaint about steady talkers is that others get no chance to exercise their own larynx. Naturally if a person talks all the time his stream of conversation carries little silt and almost no nuggets.

At the fair folks watch the judging and talk, look at the horses and talk, look at the cakes and drool. They bend an ear, but their gums, work their tongues, pour out the words. It's visiting. It's human beings having a good time by being human beings.

Coming to see the exhibits at the fair is an enjoyable experience. But coming to see the people is often the part that gives the greatest amount of fun. Fact is, a man's a lot more fun than a horse and a woman more interesting than cow. It's people who make their own shows and that just by being there, by visiting, getting acquainted, by telling about their families, their tomatoes, their recipes, their automobiles, their tractors, their ambitions.

So one of the best things at a fair is people—and it's fun to be among 'em.
