Giant Jacks Will Lift Union Pacific's Columbia River Bridge While Trains Run

The Union Pacific Railroad's half-mile-long Columbia river bridge near the atomic tri-cities—Pasco, Richland, and Kennewick—is going to be raised nearly seven feet higher while trains roll over the span as usual. Lifting the 2,672-foot structure will be accomplished with 250-ton jacks while the approaches are raised accordingly. Two additional spans 75 and 90 feet long will be added to the ends of the bridge. The U. S. Army, Corps of Engineers, have awarded the contract to the Condict Co. and Thomas Rigging Co., Berkeley, Calif., as a portion of the McNary dam project. The Engineers recommend that the raising be handled by making eight 10-inch lifts in 32 stages. Traffic will not be interrupted.
