NOT ALL the clay in Georgia's hills is red. Some is pure white and is called kaolin. This silicate of aluminum is unfamiliar to most Americans. Yet, with its many uses and applications, it is an influence in every household. Plants like this process 500,000 tons annually.

ALL-IMPORTANT in the hundreds of vital tasks kaolin performs is its employment by the paper industry in coating and filling its products.

MILADY PERHALS doesn't realize it, but kaolin is used in manufacture of face powder, rouge and numerous other cosmetics she uses every day.

AT DEPOSITS near Macon, kaolin is obtained by strip mining. Once overburden is removed, draglines move into action. They load International trucks, which move 300 tons daily to the mill.
