WHAT'S DOING
Cal Horn, your Telephone Manager

It takes hundreds of phone calls daily to build our dam, says H. B. Elder, Resident Engineer, Corps of Engineers, U. S. Army

Building The Dalles Dam is the responsibility of Mr. Elder. Eventually it will be the world's second largest in power output. This 300 million dollar project is at the peak of construction and over 4,000 men are now employed. The cost of field construction is averaging in excess of 5 million dollars a month. The Resident Engineer's office has a large switchboard and numerous telephones, some of which extend to locations in the vast working area. Hundreds of calls are placed and received daily within their own organization and to the many contractors on the project. "You can't build dams without using the telephone," says Mr. Elder.

Thank you, we are mighty pleased to have a part in the building of this stupendous hydro-electric dam which will serve the growing needs of the Pacific Northwest.
