New Grasses May Suit Eastern Oregon

Two range grasses that looked good in experimental trials may be useful on Eastern Oregon range lands, according to a report from the Squaw Bluff-Harney branch of the Oregon State college agricultural experiment station.

Scott Cooper, agronomist, reports that in 1953 to 1956 yield trials, Siberian wheatgrass out-yielded the standard crested wheatgrass in all four years. And big bluegrass topped both wheatgrasses in yield the last three years.

The big bluegrass was slower to get started, Cooper explained, but was a consistent high yielder once established. It starts growth much earlier in the spring than crested wheatgrass but is easily pulled up by livestock—a characteristic that will probably have to be corrected by plant breeders.

Yields in the trials were figured as pounds of air-dry matter, about the same as field-cured hay. Rainfall during the experiment averaged a little over 11 inches a year.

Cooper also found that tall wheatgrass was a high yielder during wet years, but fell down on yields during dry seasons. In contrast, hard fescue ranked high during drier years than in wetter years. Twelve grasses were tested in the trials.

High School Ages Need Polio Shots

High school and junior high youths are a neglected group in regards to polio immunizations, the county health officer told a committee of the local medical society Thursday night. Where over 50% of grade school children are protected and the number is increasing all the time, percentage of youths protected remains 20% or more below the general figure. Possibly because they are old enough to be pretty self sufficient, parents do not press them hard enough to attend to immunization.

As a result, the local medical society has agreed to provide physicians and nurses for immunization clinics in the high and junior high schools. A charge of $1.00 per injection—slightly reduced because of the mass production nature of the clinic—will be made by the attending physicians. The health department will provide tax purchased vaccine and cooperate in record keeping.

Shopping Days Are Accident Days

Retail emphasis on Friday as a shopping day was reflected for the first time last year in Oregon traffic accidents as it replaced Saturday as the day with the highest number of accidents.

The change came only in urban areas outside cities, Saturday still reigned as the day with the most accidents, the Oregon Traffic Safety commission reported today.

Both days, however, had to take back seats to Sunday in the fatal accident column. While the first day of the week produced fewer total accidents than any other day, it had the highest number of fatal mishaps, with 78 death-dealing crashes.

Saturday was its closest rival with 65 fatal crashes. Safety officials said there is reason to believe that Saturday night revelry also played an important part in shoving the Sunday death count upward.

Statistics show that the two worst hours of fatal Sunday crashes were from 1 to 3 a. m. and the commission hazarded a guess that "to much Saturday night partying was the cause." In fact, Sunday during the 1 to 2 a. m. period was the worst single hour for any day of the week.

Traffic at these hours often involves a larger number of drivers either too tired and sleepy or too intoxicated to be driving, the commission added.

More Westerners Own Cars

Car ownership per family is higher in the west than in any part of the nation, the Oregon State Motor association said today.

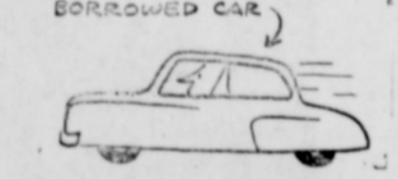

In the west, 81 per cent of families own cars, compared to 78 per cent in the north central area, 70 per cent in the south central and eastern areas and 69 per cent in the north eastern area. The extent of two-car ownership is shown by the fact that 14 per cent of families in the U. S. now have two cars or more.

A new display of painting of Indians is being shown at Maryhill museum this year and is attracting visitors interested in this form of art. Only a few painters have been able to catch the personalities of American aborigines on canvas. In addition to the Indian paintings there is a large exhibit of Indian artifacts showing the tools and weapons used by natives of the Pacific northwest. The material gathered by Sam Hill, donor of the castle remains an interesting part of the total exhibit to be seen by those who go to Maryhill with its peculiar history to visit the museum.
