Oregon Crops Good; Nation Only Fair

Oregon crop prospects at mid-year are generally favorable but farmers throughout the nation may reap the smallest total crop harvest in six years, report Oregon State college agricultural economists.

Oregon farmers will probably follow the national trend this year toward less wheat and corn but a bumper barley crop. Fewer peaches, grapes, and prunes than last year are also expected in Oregon, but increases are in sight for most other field and fruit and nut crops, according to USDA's July crop report.

Hay production in Oregon for 1957 is estimated at more than two million tons, up 7 per cent from last year and 20 per cent more than average. The state's barley production is forecast at a record-high of 22 1/2 million bushels, 5 per cent larger than last year and nearly double the average harvest.

Present prospects are for a Bartlett pear crop about one-fourth above average, and fall and winter pears are estimated at nearly one-fifth above average. A sizeable crop increase is also expected in Oregon's late summer potatoes.

The generally good prospects for Oregon harvests are in contrast to the national picture. A combination of bad weather and Soil Bank acreage cutbacks has resulted in the smallest planted acreage in nearly 40 years, the economists report. The national crop output now looks to be about 7 per cent below last year and the smallest since 1951.

Major crops planted last fall and this spring in important areas throughout the United States got off to a slow and unpromising start. Favorable weather for the rest of the growing season could change the picture but probably not enough to match last year's record tonnage.

Meanwhile, farm income supported by slightly higher farm prices and Soil Bank payments is holding up. Spending for food has been up about 5 per cent, in line with a 5 per cent increase in consumer income. About half the increase went to cover higher marketing charges with the other half going to farmers.
