In the spring of 1955 a corps of patient interviewers, notebooks in hand, rang doorbells of private homes in all parts of the United States—from Maine to California; on farms, in small towns, in cities. They made about 6000 interviews.

They asked homemakers to tell them what foods their families ate at home the previous week. They also requested relevant data such as number of meals served, how many persons dined and the family's income.

From the mass of data collected much was learned about consumers' food customs and the market for food. Chief findings about the market for meat—about differences in meat eating by region, by farm and non-farm families, and by family income—are described in this report. Data deals with the so-called "red" meats, beef, veal, lamb, mutton and pork and their products.

Highlights of the data that follow are:

Meat was 25 per cent of the food budget of the interviewed families. It was a higher percentage in cities than on farms, primarily because city incomes were higher.

Beef and pork as such were 79 per cent of all meat eaten. Veal,

JAPAN "BUYS AMERICAN" IN OREGON AND IN ALL THE 48 STATES

A Survey Shows How Each State Benefited from Trade with Japan in 1957

OREGON

OREGON'S SHARE OF THE JAPANESE MARKET IN 1957

(millions of dollars): Grains $3, Sawmill products $1, Wood pulp $1, Others $2. TOTAL: $6,593,000. (The statistical estimates shown are lower than actual grain export figures, which are also reinforced by transshipments of grains and other products grown elsewhere.)

WASHINGTON, D. C.—A report provocatively entitled "Japan Buys American in All 48 States" has just been released by the United States-Japan Trade Council.

The 12-page report of charts, graphs and text summarizes an exhaustive state-by-state survey. The survey's purpose was to estimate how much "each of the states shared immediately in the benefits from the $1,221,360,000 worth of commodities exported by the United States to Japan in 1957."

Texas with $105 million worth of commodities was the top exporter, but every other state made substantial shipments (see map).

The report points out that, although Japan is fairly well known as our best customer second only to Canada, not many Americans realize the nature and value of exports to Japan from their own state.

The 10 chief commodities exported to Japan in 1957 were (in millions of dollars): Iron and steel mill products $241.1, raw cotton $217.3, industrial machinery $121, Grains $113, Soybeans & other oilseeds $63, Petroleum & products $59.1, Bituminous coal $53.3, Copper & products $49.4, Chemicals $36.7, Inedible animal oils $19.6.

In releasing these figures, the Trade Council made two important points: First, that Japan's U. S. purchases have shot up dramatically, by 200 per cent, since 1950—and not simply in several but in all categories of products; second, that Japan in 1957 bought more than twice as much from, as it sold to, the United States.

However, the relationship between pork eating and income was not uniform. In the West and on farms generally more pork was eaten by higher income families. Among city families of North Central and South, those of higher income ate the least pork.

Higher income families used more of the expensive cuts of beef such as steaks and roasts. Except on farms, consumption of ham, pork chops and bacon was about the same for all income groups. Such meats as stewing beef and sausage were more popular among low than high income people.

Higher income families paid higher prices for all their meats. They spent more money than did low income families—even for pork.

For a summary, a comparison can be made showing to what extent families with higher incomes used their extra buying power to buy more meat, versus to choose higher-priced meat. For veal and lamb, the chief effect was in larger quantity purchased rather than in a higher price paid. For beef, the price paid increased almost as much as quantity, and for pork, the higher income families paid higher prices per pound even though they bought fewer pounds. For all meats combined, the effect of income was greater on price paid than on quantity bought. This result of the study is highly significant in a period of rising incomes and large meat supplies such as 1955, consumers with high buying power use that power more to select the kind and quality of meat they want than to buy larger quantities. In such a circumstance producers and marketers may have much to gain by giving attention to turning out a desired product.

There is no hard and fast rule for recommending creep feeding for calves. Several factors must be considered some of which depend on individual farm and ranch programs, availability and cost of suitable equipment, labor and feed. Other factors that will determine profit from creep feeding are: Age of cows—extra gain on calves from 2-year-old cows. Fall calf price—when calf prices are high in the fall (for example
