Cheapest Fertilizer Saves $5 per acre...

Most Profitable Rate Earns $18.72 per acre

How much can I save per acre by buying the cheapest fertilizer possible?

How can fertilizer rate affect my profit per acre?

What's the best way to find out how much nitrogen I should use?

Where can I get the best help with quick tissue tests of my crops?

This depends on rate applied, of course, but here's an example: A recent study of San Joaquin Valley cotton fertilization showed a difference of 2.5 cents a pound between the highest and lowest costs of nitrogen and phosphate. The average usage was 200 lbs. per acre of N and P combined. The biggest savings possible, therefore, was 200 x 2.5 cents—or $5 per acre.

In the same San Joaquin cotton study, it was shown that the most profitable rate of N—established with the help of an experienced fertilizer dealer—produced 1250 lbs. of lint. However, 20 lbs. less N per acre produced only 1187.5 lbs. The difference of 62.5 lbs. of lint, at 30 cents a pound, amounted to a profit gain of $18.72 per acre for the most profitable rate of N.

The most profitable rate of nitrogen is the one which lasts in the plants up to a certain "cut-off point" after which no more nitrogen is needed for yield. To find this "cut-off point", apply three different rates of nitrogen and use quick tissue tests during the growing season. When you compare results of these tests with differences in yield, you'll know which will be the "most profitable" rate next year.

Brea Brand dealers have been using quick tissue tests for four years, on all Western crops under all kinds of conditions. They're ready to give you the benefit of this combined experience in finding the most profitable rate and lowering the "real cost" of your fertilizer.
