Man of Vision

One hundred and fifty years ago, Cyrus Hall McCormick, inventor of the world's first successful reaper, was born on the family farm in Rockbridge County, Va. In observing the sesquicentennial of his birth, International Harvester Company depicts the evolution of farm machinery from its infancy up to today's high standards of mechanization. The above drawing shows McCormick, age 22, at the first public test of his reaper in July, 1831. Below is the company's newest combine—the McCormick No. 151 self-propelled hillside harvest-thresher. As a comparison, the first reaper could harvest 10 acres a day. Today's modern combine will handle up to nine times as much.
