THIRTY YEARS

October 1, 1929, thirty years ago this editor and wife bought the Grass Valley Journal and the job of writing for public consumption began.

Thirty years is not a long time in the newspaper business; many persons have been at it twice as long, few, however, as editors. For a part of that period they have been printers, type-setters or publishers and not responsible directly for the words that cover the news sheets and make the body and soul of a newspaper.

It so happens that all of the jobs of newspaper production occasionally fall to this editor who is publisher, stereotyper, make-up man, editorial writer, columnist. It is a distinction that is becoming rare in the industry which is running to specialization so fast that small newspapers will probably be eliminated when the present generation is folded and mailed to whatever address old editors are dispatched.

Of the thirty years the first ten were bad economically and the last twenty fabulous in the county. Over that improvement we make no boast. Our early ambition was to help consolidate the county because it is surely a homogenous unit. That has occurred and we think we were of some aid in the process. The county now has one high school, an improvement we wrote about consistently for 25 years (which doesn't show much power).

On the business side we publish a paper for one in every three persons in the county, a record that no other paper can approach. But we have never been able to convince merchants that consistent advertising would slow the attrition of departing business although customers trade away from home lured by newspaper advertising.

There are easier and more certain ways of making money than by running a newspaper. There is work involved in paper production and it requires attention—as much attention as one can muster. There is, as has been said, much freedom in it and no freedom from it. We think both the work and the necessity for attention good for us or for anyone. We are not complaining for if we don't like it we can go back to herding sheep.

What we like most about the newspaper business is that it gives us an opportunity to write, to express ourselves as freely as sober judgment indicates, on whatever subjects come to mind. Some one will always read it and some will agree and some will not. Whatever side is taken is beneficial to the reader who gains by the mental stimulus involved. And, lo, we have performed a service.

How much longer we will continue to perform this service we do not know, but it will not be thirty years. That will not be necessary. Essentially we have always said the same thing; have held to the same tenets; have expressed the same philosophy. During the whole of the thirty years we have written something for this newspaper every week. There has been no vocation from the typewriter although occasionally from the type cases. That is a record of consistency to equal the consistency of thought.

MR. K IS GONE

Now that Mr. K has come and gone we do not see that his visit did us any harm, as we suspected it wouldn't. Nor has it done much good, unless it will cause the Russian boss to put more emphasis on consumer goods for his own people.

We are very certain that no one could get much of an idea about the real America in ten days even though directed by the state department, which assuredly had its own motives in choosing the route. Learning what makes us tick could not be done in that time, and, it is reported, Mr. K was not very attentive during much of his trip. It was only when people were present that he took interest.

He seems to be quick, sharp, positive and without much education or knowledge of the humanities. We would not care to have him as a neighbor.

But having him for a neighbor is not something the United States can choose. He is our neighbor, internationally speaking, and he does not seem inclined to move away. We will have to get along with him and a little visiting back and forth may help us get along.

CHANGING TIMES

There are many things now in farming and whether we think them good or bad does not affect their spread. A good deal of livestock feeding for market is in the hands of businessmen who have built great feeding lots where the best feeds are handled automatically and the stock put through on a rigid schedule that is far faster than could be realized on the average farm.

Chickens and swine are put on a production line with results that can be pre-determined. Cattle are grown under conditions that make the size and weight as easily determined and as uniform as the packaging of bread or cigarettes. Land is examined and analysed and then treated and farmed to make it produce any wanted crop.

Now there is a sort of pool arrangement under which a city dweller puts money into a business venture and a manager pays him dividends just like he had invested in General Motors.

This definitely isn't the good old "family farm" about which so much has been said and over which, recently, so many tears have been shed. Actually there never was a clear definition of a family farm unless it was a farm on which a family lived which included most farms.

We have been taking some steps ourselves. Big machinery takes care of our farm power so quickly that the farmer has more time than formerly. High taxes and high income has removed most of the animals from the average wheat farm and eliminated the chores they caused. A farmer might as well live in town and we think more of them will. At least they can if they want to, no longer being tied to farm duties night and morning.

In our particular case we need a variant from the ceaseless round of wheat which may have just about run its course. Water may solve the problem on some farms and livestock on others. New developments in agriculture are making harder competition for all farmers and are causing an increase in the capital required. A young man can no longer follow the path of his father and expect to continue in the same way of life; farmers are getting more scarce and business men are moving into the field and the old ways are of limited duration.

MR. ROCKEFELLER

A report has been issued that Nelson Rockefeller, governor of New York will enter the Oregon primary next May as well as in other states. We think Mr. Rockefeller a very pleasing politician but we won't know whether he is motivated by the avarice of his paternal grandfather or the piety of his father. Avarice and piety have often been combined in this country. He may be more like the Aldrichs, who had a beneficial interest in public affairs.

The nation has not been lucky in choosing a New York governor as president, nor in selecting one born to riches to lead the country. So far we have felt that we could not afford Mr. Rockefeller.

He found the state of New York in debt and pledged to huge expenditures. His method was to raise more taxes instead of reducing the expenditures. That is a policy we do not like, adding the indigent to spend all the money the successful can raise is not good government, good financing or good politics. It may be good politics.
