Many beef cattle operators will turn up at weaning time with only a 60-70 percent calf crop. One of the major causes is cows not being settled during the regular breeding season. This may be helped considerably by having these cows pregnancy tested in the fall of the year. This is a job that needs to be done by an experienced veterinarian.

The charges for it will very depending on the distance the veterinarian has to travel and the number of cows to be checked.

Economically speaking, this is money well spent, since one is required to carry a cow through two winters and two summers before any income may be derived from her.

Between now and December 31 is an excellent time to have beef cow herds tested to determine cows not pregnant. These cows should be removed from the herd and sold in the slaughter trade.

Winter Feeding of Ewes

The last month of pregnancy is perhaps the most critical time, nutritionally speaking, for pregnant ewes.

Feeding capacity for these pregnant ewes is restricted due to the unborn lambs, fluids and tissue present in the abdominal cavity. This requires that the feed be a more concentrated-type ration due to the limited space. Supplemental feeding may consist of three-fourths to one pound of grain, two pounds of molasses, or three pounds of excellent-quality legume hay.

Winter Storage of Glads

Two kinds of corn rot, common on gladioli, can be largely eliminated by drying and curing the glads as quickly as possible after digging. This prevents development of the root and crown rotting fungi called Fusarium and Botrytis.

Hold corns for three weeks at room temperature (70° F.) for adequate drying. If special drying equipment is available, the drying period can be reduced to two weeks at a temperature of 95° F., and 80 percent relative humidity. Where the drying temperature is below 95° F., more time is needed for proper curing. Store bulbs through the winter in a cool, well-ventilated place.

Dehorning Calves
Calves that weren't dehorned last spring at branding time should be dehorned as soon as possible.
