Oregon In History

October 31, 1834—The flattening of the head is practiced by at least ten or twelve distinct tribes of the lower country. . . I saw, today, a young child from whose head the board had just been removed. It was, without exception, the most frightful and disgusting object that I ever beheld. The whole front of the head was completely flattened, and the mass of brain being pushed back, caused an enormous projection there.

The poor little creature's eyes protruded to the distance of half an inch, and looked inflamed and discolored, as did all surrounding parts. Altogether I felt a kind of chill creep over me from the contemplation of such dire deformity, yet there was something queer in the physiognomy, that I could not repress a smile. . . John K.
