Many Women Spend Years As Widows

If surveys on marriage are heeded, today's woman can expect to spend 15 years of her life as a widow. Yet, most couples plan for the future as if the husband will be the surviving spouse.

Preparation for widowhood, while both partners are alive, is wise planning, believes Mrs. Roberta Frasier, OSC extension family life specialist. Since separation by death may occur at any time, she suggests that young, as well as older couples, develop and maintain a plan for the future.

Nationwide surveys show that 700,000 marriages are broken by death each year, and in two-thirds of these the wife is the survivor.

Regardless of the age at which the family is broken by death, the survivor may as well realize she'll face loneliness. There's no formula for quick recovery from bereavement. She suggests that women develop new interests and friends, and try to maintain their own homes, at least for several months or a year.

Preparation for widowhood can and does develop before marriage, Mrs. Frasier believes. Women who are well-adjusted before marriage will weather widowhood and other crises after marriage.

Mrs. Frasier recommends that husbands and wives cultivate some separate interests apart from activities they do together.

Mothers can also help their daughters to mature "emotionally" and encourage them to postpone marriage until they have developed some marketable skill or prepared themselves for a professional career—as an insurance policy for years ahead.

By the time women reach 70 years of age more than half of them are widowed. However, widowhood is not limited to the older age groups. It's estimated that one out of ten women between 45 and 54 is widowed and one in four in the 55 to 64 age bracket is in a similar situation.

Ten years ago, there were 634 million widows in the U. S. Today, there are about 834 million. Chances of their remarriage are slim. Only about two widows in 1000 over age 65 remarried, according to a 1950 survey.

Precision Feeding for

WHEAT

Nutrients must be within reach of the natural growth pattern of feeder roots if they're to be used by the plant. The Shell Nitrojection Service® I provide places nitrogen in a broad vein where it is readily available to roots. And it stays there, because Shell NH₃ is ammoniac nitrogen, and won't leach away. The depth, spread, and staying power of Shell NH₃ injected in the root zone, are your best assurance of proper (and profitable) nitrogen fertilization for your crop.
