FARM PROBLEM

In a press release from her office Maurine Neuberger says: "Nearly 70 percent of the Department of Agriculture budget of $6.8 billion goes for price support payments or soil bank bounties to the growers of six crops. It is estimated that the 2.7 million farms which sold less than $2500 of products each averaged only $109 in price supports—far too little to bring those families up to satisfactory living standards. At the same time, the 1.3 million farms that sold $5,000 or more of products received an average of $1993, with many individual support payments exceeding $100,000. The present price-support umbrella shelters the big farm operator, but leaves the family-sized farm out in the cold."

We would like to educate Maurine to some more modern thinking. By far the larger part of this nation's citizenry are consumers and only a little over ten percent produce the food we eat. The ones who live on a farm and eat what they raise do us consumers no good.

If we consumers are going to pay a subsidy—and it looks like we are—we had better pay it to the farmer who produces in big enough quantity that there is some left over for us.

The idea of subsidies is distasteful and most of them are made necessary by the ignorance of governmental bureaucracy. That is true of all subsidies, not merely those in agriculture. If congress quit babying the small producer of wheat (the family-sized farmer) the big farmers who feed the nation would get along very well and also very likely would find a way to export the surplus. Remember, private business once did that very thing before government interfered.

HISTORY IS AN ASSET

Lake county has as many historical sites, as interesting a history as any, and almost 10,000 square miles of often odd geology and it doesn't seem to give a damn about any of it.

The original Fort Warner was built on a flat near Hart mountain and because General George Crook came to it first in a blizzard he moved it across Warner lake to a site on Honey creek. To move across the lake he built a stone causeway for wagons.

All very interesting. But there is no marker and almost no written history of old Fort Warner and what there is was contributed by the Order of the Antelope; there are no markers pointing the way to the stone causeway which is certainly an oddity if there ever was one; and to get to the site of new Fort Warner you need a jeep. All remnants of the fort are gone long since, some say as firewood for settlers who apparently left after the supply of wood ran out.

The point is that all this history could be an asset to Lake county now that its uranium supply is depleted. It could use something other than the crassly commercial.

We must admit a bit of a shudder at the thought of making history a commercial enterprise. But it is often necessary to interest those whose interests are commercial in order to get the roads built, the signs erected, the stories printed.

Whether from pride or from profit Lake county might well make use of its history, its historical sites, its odd geology.

AT LAST!

An effective economical way to control these noxious weeds:

- ✓ Field Bindweed
- ✓ Canada Thistle
- ✓ Russian Knapweed
- ✓ Leafy Spurge

New Du Pont "Trysben" 200 weed killer controls a wide range of noxious weeds, as well as woody vines and brush. Field tests show "Trysben" will keep roadsides, rights-of-way, fence rows and similar areas free of noxious weeds that have been difficult to kill with other chemicals. People's Column

To The Editor:

Being one of the elected delegates from Oregon's 2nd Congressional District, I would like to make a brief report, even though many of your readers saw on TV and heard over the radio, the proceedings of the Republican Convention in Chicago, which was of much interest to many people. To be among the more than 2,600 delegates and alternates was thrilling to one who has never attended a political convention. I certainly received a greater conception of what was really going on at the convention.

The demonstration for President Eisenhower and Mamie was tremendous—wherever they appeared—and this was also true of Vice President Nixon and his family. All of this, of course, was to be expected. The sincerity of all the people was greatly emphasized in their display of loyalty.

Demonstrations for Governor Rockefeller and Senator Goldwater was also outstanding. The younger people were conspicuous among these groups.

There was much dignity, statesmanship and political strategy shown. The conduct of all the delegates and visitors was in excellent form. The speakers were among the nation's best and everyone was outstanding in his or her field. Each had a message that was sound and down-to-earth and their delivery indicated their deep sincerity.

President Eisenhower so ably stated that he had a challenge for Khrushchev—to permit the holding of free elections in all communist-controlled countries, so that these people could decide for themselves the type government they desire. The president received a tremendous ovation when he replied to Nikita's statement that our grand children would grow up under a communist form of government. Mr. Eisenhower's answer was in the reverse, and that was that one day all the communist-controlled countries' grandchildren would grow up under a free world.

Vice President Nixon's acceptance speech was a classic. It had a ring of fortitude, courage and determination, a keen insight of the problems of our great nation, as well as the unsettled foreign countries. He climaxed his speech when he quoted a statement that was made to Lincoln in time of crisis, "that we would win if God was on our side." Lincoln's reply was that, "we shall win if we and our country are on God's side," and with that statement, Nixon said, "I accept your nomination."

Like many of our leading statesmen of the United States, Henry Cabot Lodge has been conspicuous in the eyes of the world for many years. His position in the United Nations representing the United States, has made him a natural to be Richard Nixon's running mate for the vice presidency. It is my firm opinion that our nation could not select a team so strong and so well-informed and with a tremendous lot of experiences, to head and lead our nation at this time. Our foreign policy is one of the major issues. These two men are armed with the knowledge it takes to meet the foreign situation as well as our own economic problems. They both have shown the courage and fortitude without fear, to face our enemies, such as Khrushchev and that is what it takes to maintain our rightful place as a great nation and a leader of a free world.

Congressman Judd of Minnesota, the keynote speaker, laid the cards on the table, covering the period beginning in the '30's. There was no fanfare in his remarks, it was sound and down to the grass roots as to what has happened to the U.S. economy and lessened the value of a sound dollar. His message should be read by every American voter, regardless of his or her political affiliation.

All the atmosphere in and around Chicago was that the U. S. is the best, most powerful and influential nation in the world. Not one bit of evidence that we are a "second rate nation."

PROGRESS

There is some evidence that the human race makes progress somewhat like a frog jumping, a long gain and a period of resting. Efforts to change it have been unsuccessful.

A group gets into control of a nation's economy and if the members are bright and alert and ambitious they can shove that nation ahead in a long leap. Then their grandchildren get lazy or arrogant or the majority finds a demagogue and the fruits of the progress are divided up into a lot of pieces. The ones with ability to go ahead are submerged or even killed off and the country lapses into inactivity until it can breed some more smart and ambitious people.

Under this process different classes of people make progress at different times; the brighter ones forge ahead and accumulate while the ones with lesser abilities look on in envy. Eventually they get around to taking the fruits of the able one's labor and then they obtain an increase in ease, which is the ordinary man's idea of progress.

If this process could be made continuous it would be better and result in less conflict. This killing off, or discouraging, the very few who are capable of making progress is an expensive pattern and the habit of keeping the fruits of success from the ordinary citizen until he takes them causes its share of trouble. Wanna make a world over, including people?

OWNERSHIP

They come into the garden from the upper end by the apple tree and hesitate under its shade for a moment. There are a good dozen of them and probably fifteen, led by the bolder males who hurry into the squash vines which must seem huge to them but are really very ordinary. From there they rush, like a squad of infantry in battle, to the shade of the sunflowers from which they reconnoiter, while the commanding general, the mother hen herself, cautiously leaves the apple tree's shade to see how the troops are deployed.

The mecca is the cantaloupe vines amidst the corn where the shade is deep and the dust refreshing. The cantaloupe vines are of special prominence in the eye of the gardener. Hidden by the deep green leaves they wallow in the dust, peck at corn ears or growing melons, and enjoy themselves without restraint of law or manners.

This is a family of pheasants that invaded the editor's garden. And they're welcome. They think they own it, maybe they do.

For what is this business of ownership anyway. The law, which is but white man's law at best, says that I own it and I have a piece of paper to prove it. I can go to the black-robed supreme court for authority on that subject. But this family of pheasants does not read my paper, does not speak my language—disdains it for a simple communication of cheeps—and does not acknowledge selfish theories of ownership anyway.

The dust pits under the cantaloupe vines are to be used by them as the owner does not care for them; the green cantaloupe are refreshing to them and the owner would find them distressing. Everything, in the world of pheasants, is for use; if it is there, let some one use it who wants. It grew on this earth, as did we all. Should it not be for the use of any who needs it. Why should anyone, or any group, take for himself the arrogance of ownership?

It is well enough to say that men have improved the world because they feel they own a part of it. No one knows what a luxuriant place it might have been if they had stayed chattering in their trees.

The 49 persons killed in traffic in July were divided into age groups by decades 10 in the first (under 10) 7 in the second, 7 in the third, 7 in the fourth, 9 in the fifth, 6 in the sixth and 3 over 60. Pretty hard on kids.
