UNRIVALED FOR UNIQUE-NESS is this site in the famed Hells Canyon reach of the Snake River where Idaho Power Company's big Oxbow hydroelectric project was completed Tuesday to tame North America's deepest gorge a second time. Here the Snake flows between towering mountains around the "oxbow" named after the early-day yoke used to team oxen—before entering the heart of mile-deep Hells Canyon. Idaho Power harnessed the unique horseshoe bend with a rockfill dam (left circle) on one side of the bow. Water from the reservoir flows through twin tunnels in the mountain at center to spin four initial generators in the powerhouse (right circle) on the opposite side. Oxbow's completion which came with start-up of the fourth generator, makes Idaho Power's new three-dam development of the Hells Canyon reach two-thirds complete, with only the already-started Hells Canyon Dam remaining. Bowline Dam was completed in January, 1959, as the development's first unit.
