Truck Rustling New & Easier Kind

A new type of rustler, who steals wheat and barley instead of cattle is giving concern to the grain industry, says T. Ralph Harry, grain division chief, state department of agriculture.

Harry says the grain trade is experimenting with mixing confetti with grain to stop increasing thefts. The confetti earmarks the grain as stolen and is next to impossible for a rustler to remove. Now the grain trade wants to go a step further and in effect, brand the confetti. The trade is considering use of a registered number on the confetti. This is much the same idea cattlemen use in branding their animals to prove ownership.

The industry has asked Harry to explore if the department or some other state agency could register confetti numbers. The department's legal counsel, Don Parker, believes the industry would need special legislation for this purpose.
