Range Seeding Conditions Good

Eastern Oregon weather last fall may have set the stage for one of the best range-seeding years in recent history, reports an OSU range specialist.

Dry weather last fall prevented normal germination of cheatgrass on rangelands that have since been well-primed for seeding of adapted range grasses, says D. H. Gates, OSU extension specialist.

When moisture finally came in late fall, it was too cold for germination of cheat, he explained.

Grasses seeded early this spring have a better than average chance to get established well enough to compete with spring-germinating cheatgrass. Some range authorities say this is the best opportunity in nearly a quarter-century to get grass started on cheat-infested range.

Gates emphasizes, however, that success of range seeding is still highly dependent upon later spring weather, seedbed preparation, and later management practices. He advises ranchers to check with local county agents in planning a seeding program.

A few basic considerations listed for seeding include:

A range site with good potential for seeding—free of rocks and alkali.

Proper preparation of a firm seedbed.

Use of grass species adapted to the area and type of ranch operation.

Good job of seeding—preferably by drilling. Broadcasting seed has not generally proved as effective.

Protection during time the range is becoming established—possibly as long as two years.

Proper management after establishment. The fact that the area needed seeding indicates that improved management is a key to keeping it productive.
