Care of Foods May Save Life

The advent of summer and its higher temperatures brought a warning today from the Oregon State Board of Health.

The Board asked picnickers especially to be aware of the problem of transmitting food infections or poisonings. Even though the Oregon Board receives hundreds of food poisoning reports a year, hundreds more are apparently unreported.

Most people are aware that such foods as cream pastries and ham can cause food infection or poisoning if improperly handled, but fail to realize that many other products, such as potato salad, rice cakes, and poultry also can be dangerous if not properly prepared and refrigerated.

These poisonings most often are caused by contamination of the food with bacteria known as insignificant scratch or nick on washing. The bacteria are deposited in the food where they multiply and produce a toxin which causes the food poisoning. Refrigeration inhibits the growth of bacteria and the development of toxin, but it will begin again when the food warms up. Thus, if a meal is prepared tonight, refrigerated until morning, then put in your hot car until you're ready to eat in the afternoon, an attack of food poisoning could well follow.
