Grain Price May Stay Above Loan

Most of the past season's gains in Oregon grain prices seem likely to be maintained this fall, reports Ray Teal, OSU seed marketing specialist. Hay supplies are shorter than expected and seed price prospects are mixed.

Writing in the new Oregon Farm and Marketing Outlook, Teal notes that prices of some feed grains this summer and fall are expected to be somewhat higher than a year ago. Supplies of Northwest feed grains are smaller than last year as harvest approaches, feeding has been heavy, and there are some indications exports may improve.

Prospects now are that Oregon barley yields will be better than last year, off-set in part by acreage cuts under the feed grain program. New barley and corn prices may be a little above last year, Teal said. Based on feeding value, oats have been overpriced and other feed grains are being substituted.

Northwest white wheat prices have been adjusting upward toward the new support price levels for the 1962 crop, but whether prices will continue above loan value equivalent as in 1961 remains to be seen, he points out.

This price level could continue if export markets are maintained or increased because Northwest white wheat carryover is the smallest in years and the 1962 crop is expected to be about the same as 1961, the specialist writes.

The hay market outlook was changed by the cold wet spring weather with the result that prices for the 1962-63 season could move above this past season's levels, Teal states. Stocks of hay in Oregon and Washington are smaller than a year ago, feeding was heavy, and prospective higher alfalfa and red clover seed prices could divert some acres from hay to seed harvest.

CARD OF THANKS

We want to thank, because we especially appreciate, the neighbors who helped when our son, Tommy, was injured and also those who sent gifts, flowers and cards to cheer us up.
