Russian Agriculture Compared To Ours

Last week we talked about Russian agriculture's feeble attempt to compete with farmers of the United States.

Now let's take a look at the future. If we convince ourselves that government farm programs will not work any better here than in Russia and get on with the business of progress under free enterprise, we will see the following by 1970, according to some economists:

About 7 per cent of the total population will be engaged in farming compared with the present 9 per cent. There will be one fifth fewer farms and each farmer will be feeding an average of 50 people compared with 27 at the present time. There will be fewer workers on the 1970 farms, but they will be feeding some 215 million Americans. We will use one fourth fewer man hours of labor for farm work to produce one fourth more output.

Family farms will be larger but still family farms. It will not be uncommon for a good family operator to control a unit of 400 to 600 acres.

Larger power units and one-operation seedbed preparation and planting will be the rule. Crop cultivation will no doubt be rendered obsolete by pre-emergence weed control.

By 1970 farmers may be purchasing nuclear farm tractors with the fuel power locked in to last until the bearings wear out.

Perhaps the greatest change will be the standard practice of producing for a pre-determined market. Because of the heavy investment and increased use of operating capital, no farmer will be able to risk growing a crop without a market. The market will also stipulate quality, size, delivery date and other specifications such as manufactured items are now ordered.

Plan For Agriculture On Portland Program

Local people from Oregon and six other Western states will have a chance to express their opinions on how to make better use of natural resources and to create economic opportunities for people in rural areas at a regional Land and People conference in Portland October 1 and 2.

The meeting was called by the USDA. Farmers, businessmen, educator, civic and government leaders and others will be invited to put forward their own proposals for advancing economic growth in their communities through rural development programs, reports F. E. Price, OSU dean and director of agriculture and member of the conference committee. Highlight of the conference will be the address of Secretary of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman, making his first major Oregon appearance since taking the cabinet post. Sec. Freeman will speak Monday morning, Oct. 1, and also will serve as conference chairman during the first day.

All conference sessions are open to the public and it is hoped that as many interested Oregon residents as possible will attend to express their views on this vital matter. Price emphasized. Short talks by Gov. Mark O. Hatfield and Portland Mayor Terry Shrunn will precede Secretary Freeman's address.

4-H CLUB NEWS

The How-D horse 4-H club had a meeting at the Orval Patnode home on the evening of September 9.

A short business meeting was held about the fair. Mr. Brinkert was the only visitor.

After the meeting we went out side to the barn to see Paulette's and Peggy's projects. Paulette Patnode, sub-reporter
