The thanks of every tired woman are due to the gallant strap-banger who gives her his seat in the crowded street railway carriage when he sees her making desperate attempts to keep her balance on her feet. But his gallantry is sometimes a little overdone, or it may be that his apparent politeness covers a hidden sense of bitterness at having to stand when he has paid for a seat. In any case a Moro lady who remonstrated with the young man when he courteously offered her his seat in a Portland car recently, felt that his reply should have been left unsaid: "Pray take it," he begged her, impressively; "my legs are younger than yours."
