THE FLICKER OF A FAST LOVE

(Original) "I wonder," thought Shirley to her sister Fanny, "what has come over papa. For several days he has been dreaming. At times there seems to flutter within him something of his faraway youth. I can see it in his eyes, his smile, though he smiles so seldom."

"Heaven grant," replied Fanny, changing color, "that he has not been caught by some intriguing woman. How terrible to think of a specially manufactured mother."

Richard Shirley's married life had been devoid of anything more than a family affection. His wife, a cold woman, whom he had married for her fortune. She had given herself, but her fortune she had retained in her own keeping. Vainly had their younger daughter, Fanny, tried to shield her father from the mother's reminders that she held the purse strings. Richard Shirley had been married, but he had never known what it was to be loved.

The family remained at their country seat till after the holidays, and every morning Mr. Shirley took his constitutional walk, usually alone. On a certain morning in November after a storm, when the air was full of snow, a few red leaves were clinging to the trees, and a thin coat of ice covered the smaller streams, he was walking along a road. Ahead of him he saw a carriage that had evidently been stalled or broken down. When he came up to two liveried servants were examining a broken spring, one of them just starting to find a blacksmith. A lady had alighted from the coach and was standing looking on. On seeing Mr. Shirley she stepped forward to meet him.

"We meet inopportune," she said, extending her hand, "after so long a separation."

"Separation! What separation? Are you not mistaken in my person, madam?"

"No, Mr. Shirley, I am not mistaken. I am not likely to have forgotten you. But why stand here? Let us go to the stone bridge yonder where my men are looking out for the repairs."

Mr. Shirley walked beside her, and they sat on the stone coping of the bridge. Too gallant to acknowledge that he did not recognize her, he returned from speech.

"Do you remember," she said, "one evening years, many years, ago a young girl sitting in her music room? Her piano stood against the wall, and a record sheet music scattered about. From a bay window was a view of a river, with mountains beyond, while between were the happy autumn fields. There was a career before the girl, but love stole in to deprive her of it. The man who drew her from it was handsome, winning, refined, aristocratic. He, too, had a decision to make. He was born to fortune; fortune was needful to him, yet he was without fortune. Should he give himself to a poor girl or reserve himself for a wealthy one?"

"They sat before the window, but not looking out. They were gazing into each other's eyes. Each knew the other's problem. The man beat forward, placing his lips near hers. His right arm rested on the back of the sofa ready to fall about her waist. His left hand nearly touched hers. She must decide whether to accept what might come by remaining where she was or decline it by rising. She decided to remain, to give up her career for him. Suddenly he arose, went to the window and looked out. He had altered her decision."

The old man when she began had been looking straight into her eye. She was at least ten years younger than he and a better preserved. He was good, she was still a handsome woman. She had been beautiful. Before she finished a dinner came before his eyes, and he turned them toward a wood on the other side of the road. Then his hand found its way to hers. What had the fortune he never got been to him in place of that sweet sympathy which, springing suddenly between recognized mates, grows stronger, deeper, hotter to the end? Slowly he turned and looked her in the eye.

"I remember," he said, "that decision gave me some fortune."

"It gave me neither. It deprived me of that which is worth far more than both—love."

"Our summer is past," she went on, "we have sowed our seed and have gathered the harvest. Now we are only waiting. That love we knew in our youth we cannot know now. We can but treasure a memory. It is a faint satisfaction, like a whiff from a crumbling rose, yet it may help us as our faculties wane and we await the inevitable winter that here at least has no awakening spring."

"It will be more than that to me," he said. "It will be a cheering light on what is left of the path I tread, a light from which all that is sensual has burned away. It will greet me when I awaken in the morning, and after my eyes have been closed at night it will still shine in upon my heart."

The footman leaving the carriage, came toward them, saluted and announced that the break had been temporarily repaired so that they could go on. The lady arose, and her companion attended her to her carriage, handing her in. After the door had closed she extended her hand through the window; there was a mutual pressure, a sudden flash through the eyes of each of the ghost of youthful love, and they parted never to meet again.

About the Stable.

The stable should have some means by which the foul air can be taken away, but not by letting the cold air directly down upon the animals. In the middle of bright days a door or window may be opened, the wind depending on the temperature outside. Nothing gives the animals more comfort than a more economical than a liberal supply of bedding. Sawdust and machine shavings are clean, easily handled, good absorbents, but possess little manurial value. Hay, straw or leaves, however, add much of value to the compost pile when saturated with manure. It will be needed for the garden or shrubs and lawn next spring. It is economy to blanket the horses, whether the stable be cold or not. In a cold stable a thick blanket should be used, while in a warm one a thin one of burp or other like material will suffice. Aside from the warmth it gives, the blanket keeps the coat smooth and clean—S. T. Maynard in Suburban Life.

Tuberculosis in Hogs. A good many cases of tuberculosis in hogs, we fear, can be traced to the creamery, due to the fact that the skim milk has not been heated to a sufficiently high temperature or kept at that temperature long enough to destroy the germs, says Kimball's Dairy Farmer. Ordinarily it is assumed that hogs become infected through bringing other animals among them, but the question of tuberculous infection through the skim milk from the creamery is becoming so serious that it will eventually lead to compulsory pasteurization of skim milk. Indeed, this has been required in some states, notably Minnesota, but the trouble is that the buttermakers do not heat the skim milk long enough or keep it at that temperature long enough.

One of the most successful stock men whom we know got his start twenty-five years ago as a result of his father giving him a calf. It is proper to note here that the calf grew into a fat steer the old man did not sell it and pocket the money. A good many generous fathers do things this way, and their sons do not grow up to be successful stock men. Their right to be a law to give boys their rights in matters of this sort.

The Fur Trade. The fur trade of North America has always been largely conducted on the principle of barter, writes Duncan MacArthur in the New England Magazine. The transactions with the Indians are carried on in a very simple manner. When a hunter brings in his collection of furs to any trading post, he usually does so twice a year, in October and March, he is taken to the trading room, where the official in charge carefully examines, classifies and values each skin, and then the whole representing the value of the entire catch. The Indian then proceeds to the storeroom and selects the Indian a number of articles, or small pieces of wood or metal, each representing the value of a "made beaver," and the whole representing the value of the entire catch. The Indian then proceeds to the storeroom and selects the Indian a number of articles, or small pieces of wood or metal, each representing the value of a "made beaver," and the whole representing the value of the entire catch.
