Who Rang the Bell?

When I was quite a young man I was clerk of a hotel in a western town. The house was of two parts, the old and the new.

One night when there was something going on in the town to give us a crowd—a county fair, I believe—a man and a woman came to the house registering as Harvey Benham and wife.

The next morning the couple had disappeared. How they got out without being seen I could not understand, but they did. Their departure was not noticed till 10 o'clock, when a chambermaid knocked to be permitted to fix up the room and, receiving no answer, let herself in with a pass key.

Several weeks passed, during which no one claimed the money. Not caring to keep it in the safe, I deposited it in the bank. Then one evening about six weeks after it had been left with me a man came to the house and stood turning over the leaves of the register.

Two or three days later who should come into the house but Mr. Benham. He looked as if he had been keeled, explaining his appearance by saying that he had had a fit of sickness.

While the man was making his explanation to the announcer and saw that there was a call from a room in the old part of the house, No. 90. There had not been a guest in that part since the Benhams were there, and I would not think of putting any one in 90, for it was off by itself, and there was no furniture in it.

Re-entering the hotel, I told "front" to go to 90 and see what the ring meant. He came back reporting that the room was empty. Resulted to find out how the bell could have been rung. I went to the room myself. Opening a closet, a dreadful stench warned me that something was wrong. I closed the door and sent for the police, and they found the body of Mrs. Benham. She had been murdered. The body had been shut up in this vacant room.

They never solved the mystery. The man Benham was never seen again, and the $1,000 is still lying in bank without an owner. Benham had doubtless kept the man who had conversed with me about them to find out if the money would be claimed without such a check, then had come himself with a forged order. He must have supposed when he killed the woman that the money was on her person.

But the mystery of the ring of the bell—that has never been solved either. I am free to admit that I never would take the story of my ringing from another.

A Dreamer of Dreams.

By JANE LUDLUM LEE. Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

"I say, Charlie, do you believe in dreams?" Thus addressed, Charlie Darlington turned slowly around in his armchair. He and his friend, Billy Laughton, were seated in the window of the American club, watching the Saturday afternoon crowd pour out of the matinee.

"Well, that depends largely on the dream," announced Darlington at length. "If, for instance, you dream of finding money in the street, take my word for it, old man, there's nothing in it. But, on the other hand, dream that some distant relative has died and you are called upon to chip in and help pay funeral expenses—well, such things have been known to happen."

"As a friend in need, Charlie Darlington," declared Laughton, "you're a cipher." "Oh, I say old man," protested Darlington, "ask me something sensible." Darlington rose from his chair and picked up his hat from a nearby table.

"I'm off. You had better go to sleep, and I'll leave word with the boy to call you in a minute you wander away in one of those dreams." Laughton did not know that his friend's sudden departure had been caused by the sight of Charlotte Comstock walking down the avenue alone. Darlington overtook her in a few minutes.

"Let's go in Balston's and get an ice," Darlington suggested as an excuse for leaving her. "You're a dreamer," he said, "and you're a dreamer." "You see, I'm not up to the mark today," he said, "I had a bad night of it—had horrible dreams all night long." Then, looking up at him and opening wide her usually dreamy eyes, she suddenly asked, "Do you believe in dreams?"

"What did Charlie mean about being too late?" asked Mrs. Comstock as the trio reached the street. "Ah, don't pay any attention to him," put in Billy. "You see, I'm not up to the mark today," he said, "I had a bad night of it—had horrible dreams all night long." Then, looking up at him and opening wide her usually dreamy eyes, she suddenly asked, "Do you believe in dreams?"

"The next morning Charlie Darlington awoke in his bachelor apartments with a most uncomfortable feeling in his head. He raised his right arm to feel his aching head, and his arm seemed to work like a piece of machinery in need of oiling. His head to all intents was bound up as in a vise. He tried to get up, but after a moment a knowing smile came over his face.

"Ah, I know," he said to himself. He pressed a button for his man, who answered the summons in a few minutes. "Hall," he demanded sharply, "what time is it? How did I get here and where was I last night?" "It's past 11, sir." Then, seeing the startled expression on his master's face, he smiled and said, "Maybe if you shook yourself you'd recall it. Guess you're not awake yet, are you?" "I don't know, Hall. I thought I was. But maybe I'm dreaming."

Where the Shoe Pinched. It was easy for Mr. Randall to hear of his wife's remarkable decision of character at all times, but her obstinacy he found most difficult to endure.

"I can't quite comprehend her," he confided to his brother after one trying experience. "Many years as we have been married, she still surprises me. Why, all in the same day, sometimes in the same hour, she will settle a disturbance in the kitchen, put the children just where they belong, adjust some matter in the church and then, when her judgment ought to be at its best, display the most astounding obstinacy in attempting to regulate my goings out or comings in. It's—it's incomprehensible."

Photographing the Deaf. "That isn't a good picture," said the photographer, with an air of apology. "The man was deaf."

"How can that infirmly affect the picture?" asked the visitor. "It gives his face a tense, strained look," the photographer explained. "All deaf persons have that expression when placed before a camera. They sit with their heads tilted forward and eyebrows uplifted, as if waiting for the command to look pleasant. Generally, I suppose, that is what they are waiting for, but even after I give them the order their muscles refuse to relax."

His Brothers. At the usual monthly petty sessions court held in a certain provincial town some weeks ago the following incident occurred:

One of the local police constables had summoned a neighboring farmer on a charge of "having a number of asses wandering at will on the public road." The defendant failed to appear, but his brother was present in the person of the clerk of petty sessions, who on hearing the evidence of the presiding magistrate, "fined 2s. 6d. and costs, rose to the occasion by replying: 'They're my brothers, your worship. I'll pay the fine.'"

Each to His Line. "Do you think a man can be honest in business?" "Matter of principle with me," said the money lender. "Matter of policy with me," said the insurance agent.
