A SOLDIER'S DOUBLE

By M. QUAD

About thirty days before Grant broke through Lee's lines at Petersburg and the beginning of the end came a portion of my regiment captured seven Confederates and brought them into camp.

I had not yet recovered from my surprise when the suggestion was made that I go into the Confederate camp as a spy on the strength of the wonderful resemblance.

I ran at full speed straight for the Confederate lines, and on dashing over a breastwork I found myself in the midst of a Louisiana brigade of infantry.

That settled it. There were about forty men in Company D. They all gathered around me and I appeared and gave me a welcome.

My two arrangements before General Mabone made me an object of curiosity and gossip in my company, and when I returned it was to find all the men anxious to see me and two or three of them seemingly suspicious.
