Secretary Redfield, of the federal bureau of commerce, now claims that the Pacific Mail steamship company quit and went out of business before they had applied to the bureau for an interpretation of the law under which they would be permitted to operate after November 1st. Redfield holds that the seamen act is subject to such regulation by his department as to give an entirely different meaning to ordinary English and that these new regulations could have been met by the steamship company. Possibly, but probably they had experienced the difficulty of a western homesteader trying to secure title to his homestead and saw the twists given the land laws by a similar bureau with ideas as to what was and what was not law.
