

UNIVERSITY IMPORTANCE

By MISS EVA ARONSON

PEOPLE who have never been to college cannot be said to be well-educated," stated Buddie, with the conviction of a man of the world. And why not? Buddie was just sixteen and this was his first year at college. Who was more competent to give an opinion on any subject under the sun than Buddie?

"I suppose that finishes me," Helen, his cousin, said with a laugh. "I have never been to college. I might aim to be a college professor's wife, though," she added, with a twinkle in her eye. "Surely that would be a college education in itself."

"Huh!" grunted Bud, and almost choked over a mouthful of lemon pie. "As if any proof would have you!" "Why not?" Helen demanded, slightly discomfited. "I am not bad-looking, and I—"

"But you are not well educated," Buddie interrupted crushingly. "You read a lot, it is true, but you couldn't talk coherently on any subject." "How do you like your teachers?" interposed his father, seeing that Helen was flushing uncomfortably.

"Teachers—old sap-heads!" said Buddie, wrinkling his nose. "Especially Lovey, the prof in psychology." "Is it quite dignified to call your professor Lovey?" inquired his father, respectfully.

"Oh, you don't understand, father!" Buddie looked immeasurably bored—"because you have never been to college. The profs know they are called Lovey and Kippy and Mittens, but they pretend they don't know. They feel awfully flattered to be nicknamed by the students."

"I suppose the professors don't count," said Helen resentfully. "You talk as though nobody counts but you." "Well, they don't count," said Buddie promptly. "Now, take this Lovey. He doesn't know how to lecture. I could lecture much better. I—"

"Surely you must be mistaken," Helen cried indignantly. "A university with a reputation isn't going to have a man on the faculty who is incompetent to teach."

"Oh, they pick out all kinds of nuts," said Buddie carelessly. "Mrs. Minton gave the signal to rise, and her little family got up and trooped into the sitting room. Helen was still burning with resentment."

"I certainly hope you will study and get good grades in your studies," Mr. Minton said, severely to his son as he unfolded his evening newspaper. "The studies don't count," Buddie answered patiently. "The atmosphere counts, and the sports, and the associations you make."

"I'm not sending you to college for atmosphere," began his father, acrimoniously, when the doorbell rang. Helen opened the door and started a little at sight of the big, smiling man confronting her. "Didn't you expect me tonight?" he asked pleasantly.

"I thought it was to be Friday night," Helen murmured, confusedly. "But won't you come in? Fortunately, the whole family is at home."

OREGON NEWS NOTES OF GENERAL INTEREST

Central, a small settlement west of Eugene, is planning a Fourth of July celebration.

Eugene is the first city in Oregon over the top in the alumni part of the University of Oregon gift campaign.

With 250 delegates in attendance from Oregon, Washington, Idaho and British Columbia, the Northwest Moose association held a three-day convention in Portland.

Material reductions in food costs in the past year are shown in a comparison of bids submitted to the state board of control for supplies for the various state institutions with prices paid for the same commodities a year ago. Except for coffee, which has advanced in price from 19.2 cents a pound last year to 22 1/2 cents a pound at this time, all staple supplies show a decline in values. Sugar, which last year commanded $9.60 per 100 pounds is now quoted to the state at $7.95 per 100 pounds.

Odd Residence Chosen by Three Englishmen

In a lonely Martella tower on the Essex coast of England there has just died the last of three brothers, who, refusing to admit women to their household, lived by themselves for nearly thirty years.

All were talented men. William Cole was a naturalist, who founded the Essex museum at Stratford and the Essex Field club. Benjamin Cole was an entomologist and Henry Cole, the last to die, was an artist, etcher and sculptor.

The tower was a comfortable though somber residence. It was difficult of access, for it is surrounded by a moat over 20 feet deep and 30 feet wide. This is crossed by a narrow iron gangway, which can be drawn up.

A heavy oak door leads into the tower, the walls of which are eight feet thick. Below are dungeons, while the roof is reached by a narrow, dark stairway set in the thickness of the wall. From the top the brothers could obtain magnificent views across the North Sea, over the estuary of the Colne and Blackwater, and across to Colchester and Brightlingsea.

Most available evidence seems to confirm the views that left-handedness is a hereditary characteristic. The infant of a few months shows no preference in the use of its hands. But when four or five months of age the normal child begins to show a preference for the right hand. The hereditary theory of right-handedness is often called the "primitive warfare theory." It was in the left hand that the primitive warrior held his shield to protect his heart. His right hand was left free to handle the spear or other weapon.

Naturally the right hand was used more and as centuries passed became more accustomed to strenuous exercise. Finally right and left-handedness became hereditary characteristics of the race. But this is only a theory. There is a wide difference of opinion on the subject. Some believe this characteristic developed by accident or education; others think that it is fundamentally physiological. It is said that most people are also right-eyed, right-eared and right-footed.

TURK WOMEN FORGING AHEAD

Restrictions on Their Freedom Are Disappearing One After Another, Says a Writer.

The contrast between the status of these Moslem women and the position of women in Turkey proper grows steadily. In fact, the restrictions surrounding Turkish women disappear more and more almost daily. Four years ago the Turkish woman shopper in Pera used to throw her veil back while in the European quarter, but would draw it over her face immediately on crossing the bridge to Stambul. Today the harem of the upper class hardly wears the veil at all. It hangs down from the side of the charshaf in a knot, and figures merely as an ornament.

A number of Moslem girls of the Turkish capital have become pupils of Robert college, the American school picturesquely situated on the hills of Bebek, by the Bosphorus. The number of Turkish women active in professions has greatly increased. During my recent visit to Constantinople I found that a young lady whom I had first met six years before had but two terms left to attain the degree of doctor of philosophy, with the ultimate aim of entering government service. The rare abilities of Halide Edib Hanoum, the well-known Turkish woman author, have been rewarded by her nomination as minister of public instruction in the Turkish cabinet at Angora.

The last remnants of polygamy virtually disappeared with the ascent to the caliphate of his majesty, Abdul Medjid. He is the first ruler of the Osman dynasty who adheres to the western form of matrimony.—Edward J. Bing, in Current History Magazine.

Few Bricks Actually Brought to America

How often you hear it said of an old house that the bricks of which it is made were imported from England or Holland, states House and Garden Magazine. People actually believe this to be a fact, just as they believe that the Mayflower brought over vast quantities of furniture. Had this been true it would have required more than one Leviathan to have brought either the furniture or the bricks.

The historian, George Cary Eggleston, remarked on this in one of his books: "Nearly all these bricks, whether English or Dutch, were made in America, as later scholarly research has conclusively proved. The only difference between English and Dutch bricks was one of dimensions. The small bricks molded upon a Dutch model were known as Holland bricks. The much larger ones, molded upon an English model, were called English bricks."

"The very learned and scholarly historian of South Carolina, Mr. McCrady, has conclusively proved that the so-called English bricks used in the construction of Carolina houses could not have been imported from England."
