Oil Now Gives Refrigeration to Farm Homes

Kerosene, to the farmer, long has meant heat and light. Now it has a new use—refrigeration.

Iceless refrigerators, manufactured for use on the farms, at summer resorts and in other localities where electricity or gas is not available, operate on kerosene.

Natural, artificial and tanked gas fuel also can be used. A milk chiller, similar fueled, cools fresh milk in three minutes, saving ice, time and expense for the dairyman.

The oilburning refrigerators are similar in appearance and appointment to those iceless devices now used in city homes, with wire shelves, porcelain lining, lacquer finish and trays for icecubes.

They consume about a quart of kerosene during the heating period necessary to prepare them to keep their contents at the recommended 50 degrees Fahrenheit for 24 to 36 hours.

Circulating water is not required, but when employed can be used again for domestic purposes after it has served as an aid to the sealed-in refrigerant, in cooling the refrigerator.

Economy of operation is stressed by the manufacturers, who claim that the milk chiller will function for an entire year on less than the cost of two weeks' supply of ice.

Utah Well Produces Snow

Dry ice is being obtained from an oil well in North Park, Jackson county, Utah. Oil production is small, but the gas which flows from the well has been found to be largely carbon dioxide so cold that the oil is frozen into snow.

Above the ground the carbon dioxide evaporates and the oil is recovered. Scientists say that the well is large enough to produce daily a trainload of dry ice.
