Stockmen Suffer From Low Prices For Cattle

Herman Oliver of John Day Says Present Returns are Under Cost of Production

Eastern Oregon stockmen, in company with the wheat growers, are wondering just what is wrong with the markets for beef cattle and sheep, says Herman Oliver, large scale stockman at John Day and a member of the state board of higher education. In an address at the recent field day of the Burns branch experiment station he gave some figures on costs of production as taken from his own records.

"There is plenty of money to finance stockmen, and more people in the country to eat the meat than ever before and yet the markets are so low that we lose on every lamb and every head of cattle sold at the present prices," Oliver pointed out.

"Under present conditions it costs me $6.50 to raise a lamb. Counting wool at 17c, also below the cost of production, and 100 per cent lamb crop to bring 6c a pound at 70 pounds, the return from lambs is around $4.20 each or $2.30 below cost of production.

"The same is true of cattle," he continued, citing more detailed figures. "At the present country price of 4 1-2 to 7c the grower is losing about $35 a head if all costs are considered. Unfortunately the farmer cannot reduce operations and cut down overhead as other industries do in times of depression," he added.

Adequate tariff on hides would be a real help, Mr. Oliver believes. While it may seem unimportant it would make a difference of getting from $2 to $2.50 for hides as is now done to $8 to $10 under adequate protection.

Motorists are becoming educated to the dangers of grade crossings and are approaching them more cautiously than in other years, according to a report reaching the Oregon State Motor Association. There were fewer accidents at grade crossings the first four months of 1930 than in any corresponding period since 1925, and fewer persons were killed.

Upper Columbia River Service To Begin Soon

Inauguration of steamboat service on the Columbia river above Portland is to take place early next month, marking the realization of hopes and plans of those interested in the open river movement. It was announced August 27 by R. H. Kipp, executive secretary of the Columbia Valley association.

The new service will be maintained by the Columbia River Navigation company, incorporated for $50,000. Captain J. W. Exon, associated with four or five practical steamboat operators, is head of the company and will be in active charge of its operation.

The steamer Cowitz, a stern-wheeler of 500 horsepower, will be placed on the run some time between September 8 and 12. She will carry about 100 tons of freight but is not fitted for passengers.

Present plans provide for placing the steamer Telegraph on the run in the spring to handle both passengers and freight.

The new line will operate between Portland and The Dalles, leaving Portland about 7 p. m. and arriving at The Dalles before 7 a. m. the next day. The steamer is to leave The Dalles at about 8 a. m. and arrive at Portland between 3 p. m. and 4 p. m. the same day. The Cowitz has a double crew of 13 men.

All classes of freight are to be handled with store-door delivery at The Dalles, Hood River and White Salmon.

This company is entirely separate from the barge line now proposed by Portlanders and is not designed to compete with it, according to Kipp. The barge line will be capable of handling larger shipments and will be particularly valuable in the movement of bulk commodities and slower classes of freight.

The Columbia Valley association is working both with those interested in the barge line and those inaugurating the new steamboat service.

Other developments on the river recently include the expansion of the way freight service of the Harkins Transportation company on the lower Columbia and the inauguration early this summer of new excursion service between Portland and Cascade Locks by the American Transportation company.

These developments indicate that the movement to make greater use of the Columbia for transportation and a scenic unit is gradually gaining momentum.

Says Farm Buying Power Still Continues Good

A market page writer in an analysis of the crop situation printed this week by a Portland daily paper with particular reference to the recent drought in the central west states that the "reduced purchasing power of the farmer" is not going to be the economic disaster generally expected several weeks ago. While crop disturbances undoubtedly do result in decreased monetary income for a number of specific areas, it is pointed out that these may be regarded as more or less isolated instances with only the totals for the entire country being of major importance.

"A tabulation of agricultural production in the United States shows that the value of principal crops (corn, all wheat, oats, barley, rye and hay), based on quantities as of August 1, 1930, and prices as of August 11, 1930, and allowing for a 7 per cent estimated damage to crops between August 1 and August 11, was $6,546,400,000, as compared with $6,805,300,000 in 1927, $7,410,800,000 in 1928, $6,851,900,000 in 1929 and $6,816,800,000 as of July 1, 1930.

"Without attempting to minimize the damage and loss of purchasing power in the stricken areas, from the viewpoint of the country as a whole it seems that the drought was not without some saving features. First, the corn farmer has enjoyed relatively greater prosperity in the past than other grain farmers and is therefore better fortified. Second, with the European wheat crop adversely affected and no wheat to import from Australia and the Argentine until after the first of the year and with the increased need for wheat in this country, the drought should have helped solve that problem and eliminate governmental meddling. Third, the total purchasing power of all farmers does not appear to have been very seriously affected."
