DELIVERING THE GOODS.

The english language as spoken in the United States, is very expressive. When you hear it said that someone is "delivering the goods," immediately you understand the meaning the phrase conveys, though straight-laced grammarians may call it slang.

When you read an advertisement you have good reason to believe that the man or firm whose name is signed to it is "delivering the goods. Aside from any consideration of honesty, it is a law of self-preservation that the advertiser has to make good.

This is the reason for placing implicit faith in the advertisements. They not only tell you what and where to buy, but they offer an additional guarantee that the merchandise will be as represented. No merchant can follow any other policy and succeed.

No one should have any hesitancy about buying from advertisers. Advertised products are better products for the money. The dealer invites comparison and he has to "deliver the goods."

Business concerns which have worth-while merchandise or service, appeal to intelligent men and women through the newspaper advertising columns.
