Cover Crop Planting Advised by Agent

Orchardists at this time should give consideration to the planting of a cover crop for the purpose of improving the orchard soil and thus insure future crops of quality fruits states County Agent, L. P. Wilcox.

Rogue River Valley soils, generally, are in great need of humus. The program of growing annual cover crops and turning them under is one of the best and most economical methods of increasing humus materials in the soil.

Early planting of cover crops results in a good growth before temperatures get too low and plant activity stops. The greater the growth in the fall, the earlier plowing may be done in the spring. Early seeded crops should be drilled or harrowed in deeper than late seeded ones, by so doing the seed is placed where moisture is available and a deep rooted plant results, the better to withstand drought conditions during November, which oftentimes occur. The most common crop used is vetch, either Common or Hungarian, the latter is more hardy and is preferred by growers who have heavy clay adobe soils. In most cases combinations of vetch and grain, such as winter oats, barley or rye, are used.

The rate of seeding for vetch alone is from 50 to 80 pounds per acre, while in combination with grain the rate is from 40 to 50 pounds of vetch and 20 to 40 pounds of grain per acre.

In orchards where vetch has never been grown before, seed inoculation will be necessary.
