The SNAPSHOT GUILD
SHOOTING WITH THE SUN
IN FRONT

"Yes," says Towser humbly, "my master is a great fisherman." Outdoor silhouettes like this are made with sun in front, lens shaded, fast shutter speed (at least 1/100 second) and small stop (at least f.16.)

TIME and again novices forget the old rule that says that you should have the sun over your shoulder when you take pictures, and suffer the penalty of a sun-struck negative. They see something "pretty" and excitedly shoot at it regardless of the fact that Old Sol may be glaring directly into the eye of the camera.

It's a good rule not to forget, but it does not mean that pictures can never be taken with the sun in front of the lens. Indeed, considering the number of sun-in-front pictures that are being hung in salons these days as examples of artistic achievement in photography, it would seem as if the rule is being broken oftener than it is observed.

But, before you try for such pictures deliberately, be sure you have acquired good judgment in the use of stop openings and shutter speeds, because light and shadow conditions with the sun in front are decidedly different from those when the sun is behind you.

In all such pictures it is absolutely essential that the camera lens be shielded from the direct rays of the sun, else "lens flare" on the negative is sure to result. This can be done with a hat or other object or by jockeying around for a position in which a tree or other lofty screen places the sun in eclipse. Or you may add a lens hood to your camera accessories.

Some of the most artistic sun-in-front pictures are made with the sun's rays striking the subject slightly from behind, that is, coming from the right-hand or left-hand side, but strikingly beautiful effects may be achieved with the sun at most directly in front. The resulting "high backlighting" seems to surround the subject with a glamorous radiance. Often, sunlight striking the blowing hair of a child or girl from behind gives a lovely halo-like effect.

Remember when you prepare your camera for the picture that, with most of the light behind the subject, features of faces and the identifying details of whatever the subject may be, will be mostly in shadow, and often deep shadow. Consequently a large stop opening and longer exposure will usually be needed.

It is by shooting with the sun (or brightest part of sky) in front of the lens that outdoor silhouettes are made. These pictures can be of fascinating interest and perhaps are less difficult to take than those in which you need detail in the shadow parts. The sun need not be shining brilliantly. Use a fairly small stop opening for clear-cut outlines and elimination of detail on the side of the subject toward the camera; then make a snapshot exposure. Let your subjects be outlined against the sky on a ridge, a hill or sand dune, with the sun or strong light behind them, or have them between you and the sun on the veranda of your home or hotel. Be absolutely certain before you click your shutter that the sun's rays are masked from the lens.
