WRESTLING NEWS

For a few short seconds Monday night in the Medford armory, the hitherto undefeated Black Dragon stood unmasked, but so far as clearing up the mystery of the hooded grappler's identity, he might just as well have left his head-covering in its place.

Nobody recognized the man. He was a total stranger to the capacity crowd, and when asked his name as he was leaving the ring, he violently shook his head and continued to the dressing room, pulling the mask back over his head as he went.

After much milling, slugging, kneeling in the groin and hair-pulling, the mad Italian finally clamped on a hammerlock and applied the pressure for several minutes, with the hooded one patting the mat in agony after 7 minutes and 8 seconds.
