THE FIRST JOB

During these summer months many a young graduate will start out looking for his or her first job. A personal director or employer is quick to appraise an applicant by his appearance, before ever getting down to his special fitness for any particular work. How many of these young people, as they approach prospective employers will pass this appearance test—good posture; clear, fresh complexion; sparkling eyes, good teeth; a well-nourished body, but not overweight?

Employers are looking for a worker that will be alert and keen in a busy, crowded office. The habits that disregard "body needs" may prevent a young person from building the health which should be a part of youth, and the lack of which may keep him from succeeding to the extent of his capabilities.

A wise mother will help to establish good food habits early in childhood and will continue to encourage young people of high school and college to drink milk, eat plenty of fruits and vegetables, and include whole-grain bread and cereals in their daily meals. Such food habits, together with plenty of fresh air and sunshine and long hours of sleep will give boys and girls that look of keenness, freshness, cleanliness, and good health that should complement his or her special training for a job.

Perhaps not enough young people appreciate the importance of good nutrition in improving appearance.

Some girls, in their effort to remain slim deprive themselves of food necessary to protect health. The days when it was considered smart to be "just naturally thin" are a thing of the past—and the match-stick figures of a few years ago are definitely out. Going without breakfast, or limiting it to toast and black coffee with perhaps other meals of similar nature, produces malnourished tissues and fatigue which makes good posture impossible, may cause teeth to decay, and gives a tired, sallow look to the face.

Young people naturally do not put the same evaluation upon health that adults do. But don't let this indifference worry you—just check it off to lack of experience.

But if you have started early enough in your campaign for good habits of eating you may be sure that the young graduate will have the qualities of health and appearance which are even more important in holding than getting a job.
