An Editor's Prayer

To St. Francis de Sales, Patron of Journalists

When the galleys are strewn around us,
And the dummy is due tonight,
When a proof is lost amid manuscript tossed,
And there's something still to write;
When we sit at the keys, bewildered,
And all inspiration fails,
Then share the balm of thy heavenly calm,
Good St. Francis de Sales.

When an author forgets his promise,
But the printer remembers ours;
When a copy is shy till the hurry is nigh—
And then when it comes in showers;
When we don't catch sight of the misprints
Till the issue is all in the mails,
Then keep us whole, in body and soul
Brave St. Francis de Sales.

When our pet idea is borrowed
(With never a credit line)
When readers resent what nobody meant
And when mailing lists decline;
When we're tempted to write in acid,
Forgetting our Thabors and Gralls,
Then bind our hands in charity's bands,
Sweet St. Francis de Sales.

When all in a day, they call us
Too pious, too wordy, too loud,
Not up to the knees of the Ph. Ds
And over the heads of the crowd
Or (worse) when we think that we're weighty,
That the world before us quails,
Oh, keep us sane, and pleasant and plain
Wise St. Francis de Sales.

When the very last line is printed
And the pens and presses are stilled
And the editor's "we" is the soul of me,
By the dread of judgment chilled,
May some word of mine that was fruitful
Be found in the fateful scales—
So aid all men who wield pipe and pen,
Great St. Francis de Sales.
