Burning Straw Causes Much Loss to Farmers

Farmers who burn straw and stubble from grain and seed crops are losing valuable plant food, increasing the danger of wind and water erosion, and jeopardizing the conservation practice payments for their farms, warns E. Harvey Miller, chairman of the state PMA committee.

"Burning straw and stubble actually destroys nitrogen, phosphoric acid and potash that the operator will have to replace with high-priced commercial fertilizer— if he can find it," Miller declared. Pointing to forecast of continued tight fertilizer supplies for the coming year, the PMA chairman cited the following per ton values of crops residues, based on commercial fertilizer prices:

Crimson clover straw, $5.99 a ton; Ladino clover, $9.46; red clover,

$6.11; sweet clover, $4.80; white clover, $7.21; alsike clover, $5.86; hairy vetch, $7.41; Willamette vetch, $5.39; Austrian peas, $4.92; barley, $3.02; oats, $2.92; wheat, $2.18; rye, $2.61; grass straw (average), $2.93; bean vines, $11.18; pea vines, $9.56.

Burning crop residues also may cost a farm operator his entire payment for performing agricultural conservation practices, Miller warned. Many county ACA committees, especially in western Oregon, have ruled that straw burning defeats the purposes of the conservation program and will disqualify a farm for any practice payment, he reported.

Miller also called attention to practice payments under the conservation program for utilization of crop residues. These include "trashy" or protected summerfall, which will be offered again under the 1947 program at rates similar to this year's; hauling straw for use as a mulching material on orchard, strawberry, potato and commercial vegetable land, $5 a ton for legume straw and $3.00 for non-legume; incorporating pea and vetch straw into the surface soil on land subject to erosion, 60 cents an acre.

IMPROVING—Mr. Alfred Danielson, who was operated on last Friday and was still in a critical condition Saturday, was reported much better this week. Mr. Danielson suffered internal injuries and confusion when struck in the abdomen by a board at the Cheney Lumber Company, working on an edger last Thursday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. James Minis have purchased a place in Jacksonville and expect to move there soon.
