CITY KIDS ON THE FARMS

There is a great story featured by the Extension Service of the U. S. Department of Agriculture. "City kids" have made fine records in cotton and tobacco fields.

Nonfarm youths were an unknown quantity a few years ago. Some berry and vegetable growers had relied on them for harvesting operations in years past; but farmers as a whole put little stock in city boys and girls, for many of these new recruits were not offering to work because they needed a job or the money. Farmers were especially skeptical about housing a "green" city youngster in the farm home and making even a substitute "hired man" out of him. And many a county agent shared this skepticism.

But the youth program began a few years ago, and it has stuck through war and reconversion. The U. S. Department of Agriculture's extension placements amounted to as many as a million and a half in one war year. Backed by a good platoon system in Oregon, the youth program made a big contribution to the Northwest's fruit and vegetable production. Based on a sound program of supervision and selection, good "live-in" help was provided for the general and dairy farms of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, and others. Surveys show how much farmers liked these live-ins. Ninety percent of the Maine farmers who reported liked their boy as a worker, and 87 percent of 2,216 boys in Minnesota were considered successful.

In Iowa and Utah, more than half of Extension's placements last year were boys and girls. At least a third of the farm labor placements were youth in Idaho, Oklahoma, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, New Jersey, and the Southern Cotton States. Teen-agers last year picked 90 percent of the snapbeans in Maine, 65 percent of Idaho's potatoes, and detasseled a whopping big part of the Midwest's hybrid seed corn—75 percent, for instance, in Illinois. In Kansas, an estimated 10,000 nonfarm youth did farm work mostly in the wheat harvest.

"ONE WORLD" IS NOT ENOUGH

The attitude of the American public is overwhelmingly opposed to Russia and its schemers. On the other side of the world, Russia hasn't given an inch in efforts to re-establish Peace throughout the World. How can the United States and Russia live chummily in the same World? The opinion grows in Washington that we should bid goodbye to Russia.

SAVE YOUR CHOPS

Officials of the Department of Agriculture are concerned over the increasing danger of meat shortages this winter. There are a lot of reasons for this ensuing shortage—corn prices continue to be above reasonable prices on the Chicago market. And livestock may be on low "rations" during the next few months.

One wise newspaper reporter tells us—maybe he is only guessing: "It is a time-honored rule that when 100 pounds of hogs can't buy twelve or more bushels of corn, then there is no money in raising livestock." It could be so—maybe.
