Bright Future Seen for Youth on Dairy Farms

As a June dairy month note, young men interested in agriculture might well afford to consider dairying as a vocation which will challenge their abilities, believes H. P. Ewalt, Oregon State college extension dairy specialist.

The business offers both steady income and a bright future. The steady population increase in the Pacific coast states, says Ewalt, spells an increasing demand for more milk, especially for fluid use. This latter use is in the most lucrative position.

If Oregon dairymen fail to supply this milk, the specialist warns, dairymen outside the state will likely take over the market.

How long can an increased production per cow help to offset the decrease in cow numbers being milked in Oregon? June milk production a year ago was 3 percent less than for June 1950.

Bottle and can milk usage, meanwhile, is on the increase and without a hike in total production, this milk must come from herds which formerly supplied manufacturing milk and have now qualified for grade A.

Even though there is a temporary lack of active interest in increasing Oregon's dairy cow numbers, the state is still out in front with high individual production records and high herd production averages.

Ewalt says C. J. Berning, Mt. Angel, holds a national Holstein butterfat production record. M. C. Fleming, Troutdale, has a similar national record for Guernseys Oregon Brown Swiss are out in front with high records at the Albert Meier farm, Beaverton, where a new class leader was recently announced. Jerseys continue to lead national records with a milk and butterfat record made at the Ralph Cope farm at Langlois. Ayreshires are also represented in Oregon with a number of good producing herds.
