Dean Wilson who runs the logging crane in the Steve Wilson logging operations on Olat Creek reports some interesting experiences with rattlesnakes which are too thick in that vicinity. One of the rattlers Dean killed measured six feet.

OSC Eyes Home Habits of Pacific Rattlers

Oregon State College—Most folks run from snakes but a team of Oregon State college zoologists has been observing a rattlesnake den near Monroe for five years now.

Target of this research is the Pacific rattlesnake, scientifically known as Crotalus viridis. Long range plans call for finding out how far the snakes wander from home, how fast they grow and whether they return to the same den each year.

Portrait of a
GOOD CITIZEN

When he builds a campfire, he's careful to keep it small and at a safe distance from trees or dry grass. His fire is never left untended. When he breaks camp, he pours water on the fire or covers it with dirt to be sure it's out. He's doing his part to

KEEP AMERICA GREEN

Some 25 rattlesnakes were brought in from the area this spring, according to Dr. Robert Storm, OSC zoologist, who heads the project. As the snakes come from the winter den they are captured, marked and released.

By painting the rattles in various color combinations, each snake is "individualized." Residents in the Monroe area help in the study by sending in the rattles of any snakes captured.

Forestry Lab Secures $1000.00 Gas Turbine

A sawdust-fed gas turbine valued at $100,000 will be erected and used as experimental equipment by the Oregon forest products laboratory.

George Atherton, laboratory engineer, will make last-minute arrangements in the east for securing the 500-horsepower Houdry-type gas turbine.

The laboratory has been assured of obtaining this expensive equipment for little more than dismantling and shipping costs. Present plans call for installing the equipment at a nearby sawmill.

Installation will start in about 10 months. Research studies on finding more efficient ways of burning sawdust in combustion chambers will be completed first.

A gas turbine will permit the use of usually wasted sawdust for a power source. Waste heat exhausted by the gas turbine will be used to dry lumber in kilns. Such a unit can be used to dry lumber in kilns. Such a unit can be used in isolated places or where there is no adequate water supply.
