Dear Sir:

We really do enjoy the home town paper very much.

My daughter, Carol, and I are thrilled because we are going to the opening of the baseball season tomorrow here in Washington, but we also will remember the opening of the baseball field in Central Point.

Doctor Kate

By Adel Comandini

Modern skill and medical knowledge would probably have saved the life of Kate Pelham's mother, but at the time this story begins, such skill was not known, and so Kate lost her mother. Years later, during the years she was in high school, her best friend died, and so began the circumstances that were to form the desires of this shy young girl, for she felt that she could help in some way to bring health and happiness to others if she could be a doctor.

Her days at medical school were happy ones, and with her quick Irish wit, and shy manner she was well liked by all her companions.

Then came the day when she had to choose between being a doctor, and marrying a man who would refuse to let her follow her career if she married him. Heartbroken at having to make a choice when she wanted both, she refused to marry under such circumstances.

Then she was assigned to help in the slums of New York. Her experiences there were certainly varied and different. Her first delivery turned out to be a set of twins, and she promptly earned the respect of the entire neighborhood.

After that assignment was over, she moved away from New York, and started working in a hospital. There she met Bill Newcomb and a short time later they were married. She continued her work until Bill became so ill that he had to be taken away from the smoke of the city, to help him regain his health. Knowing he meant more than anything else to her, she took him to the woods in the northern part of Wisconsin, where he slowly regained his health.

Tragdy once again took from Kate some one she dearly loved, her infant daughter and she turned against all she had learned and said she would never again be a doctor. She didn't figure on the needs of the people around her tho, and years later she reluctantly returned to her work, managing both that and raising their son, both with th help and encouragement of her husband.

To the people of that area she became known as "Angel on Snowshoes," for many times that was the only way she could reach her patients.

She worked for the betterment of her community, and her fondest hope was for a hospital. Thru the efforts of her friends, and without her knowledge, arrangements were made for her to be on Ralph Edwards show "This Is Your Life," and her need for a hospital became known, and
