WASHINGTON, D.C.—Yesterday was the last day of the session of Congress. The Senate has adjourned sine die, leaving the House to finish its work early this week. The legislation which has passed both houses will now be sent to the President for his signature, and after that the election campaign will begin in earnest.

The House of Representatives has passed a number of important measures, including the bill to establish a national bank and the bill to revise the tariff laws. The Senate has passed the resolution to adjourn sine die, and the President has signed it.

The outcome of the election will be decided by the vote of the people in November. The issues will be the same as those of the past election, and the candidates will be the same as those who were defeated in the last election. The outcome of the election will depend on the vote of the people in the cities and the counties, and the candidates will be the same as those who were defeated in the last election.

The President has called for a special session of Congress in January to consider the matter of the war in Mexico. The war has been going on for several years, and the President is hoping to bring it to a conclusion by the end of the session.

The legislation which has passed both houses will now be sent to the President for his signature, and after that the election campaign will begin in earnest.
