HERE IS A LESSON.

In 1872, hides were put on the free list. A loud lamentation of "interested" gentlemen went up that the industry would be ruined. But look at the result.

In 1872, with a duty on hides, we exported $1,445,178 of the raw material and $3,684,020 of the manufactured product—that is to say, leather in one form or another. Now, if the theory of the high tariff people is sound, the result of taking off the duty would have been the flooding of the country with the pauper made leather and pauper made shoes of Europe, the exportation of more raw material and the ruin of our tanning and shoemaking industries.

But instead of this the exportation of leather and the products of raw hides falling off it began immediately to increase, increased steadily year by year until 1887 we exported $10,436,138 of leather and its manufactured products, an increase of 300 per cent in five years. On the other hand, while in 1872 with a duty on hides we exported $1,445,178 of raw hides and skins, we exported in 1887, with no duty at all, but $765,625 worth. In other words, instead of sending more raw material abroad for foreign workmen to work up we kept practically all our raw material at home, increased our export of manufactured products threefold, thereby giving employment to three times as many workmen at good wages as were employed when hides were protected by a duty. We have not only supplied our own vastly increased home market, the additional consumption in five years being slightly over $10,000,000, using practically all the home supply of hides, but we have imported hides, worked them up into manufactured products with American labor, paid good wages and have sold that product at good profit in the foreign markets. Therefore the free listing of raw hides has had this result: It has checked exportation of raw material, increased production of leather and the products of leather, increased the prosperity of the tanner and shoemaker by giving them more work to do, brought wealth to the country by increasing its exports, stimulated manufacturers and giving employment to three times as many workmen as when hides paid a duty.

Now these are tremendous facts, and the newspaper that either through brazen audacity or benighted ignorance asserts that the free listing of hides was a mistake, had better give them a little serious attention. They are worth whole columns of speculations and assertions as to what might happen if this or that commodity should be placed on the free list. Here is not what might, could, should or would happen, but what did happen. Here is the result of the experiment actually tried, and what havoc it does make in the ingeniously contrived theories of the protectionists! It utterly wrecks them. It leaves no two fragments holding together. It shows by the most irrefutable of all demonstrations, an appeal to the facts, that the theory of the high protectionists as to what would happen if the policy of the Mills bill should be carried out are false from beginning to end.

Four years ago, Tuesday last, M. H. DeYoung, who is now regarded as the political prophet of the republican party of this coast, said: "Oh Blaine will be elected by an overwhelming majority and Cleveland will cut a very poor figure in the fight. He will be the worst beaten man that ever ran for the presidency." He is now engaged in the same sort of braggadocio, but we will wait and see how far from the truth he is again.

Four years ago last Tuesday the Oregonian said: "It is the opinion of not a few practical observers that the democratic majority this year in New York and Brooklyn will not amount to one-third of 47,000." The majority was 58,795. We feel safe in saying that the indications now are that Cleveland will have 68,000 majority in the cities.

Wool is higher now than when it was uncertain whether the Mills bill would pass the house or not. The inevitable law of supply and demand operates at the most unexpected moment to set aside and refute the absurdities of the high protective theory of the republican party.

Speaking of wages, here is a statement of European wages taken from a Protection newspaper: Bricklayers—Austria, $3.55; Belgium, $4.56; France, $5.74; Germany, $4.21; Netherlands, $4.80; Switzerland, $5.21; England, $7.56. Austria has the highest protection and the least wages. England has no protection and the highest wages. If protection makes wages, why is this thus?

The proposition of the republican party reduced down to results is that 1,816,288 American farmers must be crippled in their business under the pretence that American workmen need home markets.
