INCREASE OF CRIME

Mr. Wines, who has been for many years connected with the state board of charities in Illinois, and has made an exhaustive study of prison and criminal matters gives some surprising figures as to the increase of crime. He finds that, while in 1850 the ratio of persons imprisoned for crime to population was 290 to the million, in 1880 it was 1,169 and is believed to have become still larger since. This increase of crime is four times the ratio of population is starting, in view of the increased reformatory agencies and the curtailment of liquor consumption as a result of prohibitory efforts. A drunkenness has diminished in the last thirty years, it is not easy to follow the theory so strongly affirmed, that liquor is the cause of most of the crime. That is the claim of all prohibitionists. Crimes are usually more numerous after a war period, and in the later years foreign countries have very largely shipped their criminal classes to this country. There is a field of investigation here for the reformer, and all good citizens.

There cannot be two opinions among right-minded persons with regard to the conspicuous absence of Mr. Ingalls from the state dinner at the White House recently. As a man, Mr. Cleveland would be more than human if he could continue to calmly overlook the personal maltreatment he has suffered from the remarkable person who is the unworthy occupant of the presiding officer's chair in the senate, and this entirely aside from the ordinary courtesy due Mrs. Cleveland and her next friend in the cabinet social circle. Of course Mr. Ingalls tries to be equal to the occasion by indulging in his usual capacity for sneering—he seems to be a concentrated sneer—but he is too proud to feel his well-deserved humiliation deeply. It is high time that an example was made of some one in this respect. Not only should men in the position occupied by Mr. Ingalls scrupulously observe the amenities of life, but the office of president of the United States should at all times command public and private respect.
