

WASHINGTON LETTER.

From our regular Correspondent, Washington, Oct. 16, 1893.

Not since the memorable silver debate began in the senate has the outlook for passing a financial measure that will receive the vote of every democratic senator been as bright as it is at this writing.

President Cleveland is not taking any part in these conferences. He is still firm in his belief that unconditional repeal is the best thing, but he will not veto any compromise which meets the approval of the democrats in the senate and house.

Laying aside personal opinions and looking at the matter from a strictly political point of view it must at once be apparent to those familiar with public sentiment in the west and south that it will be much better for the democratic party to grant some recognition to that sentiment in financial legislation than to ignore it.

All of the Ohio republican members of the house have been called home to help McKinley, who for some reason has become very much alarmed at the outlook.

The democrats of the house are setting the democratic senators a good example in keeping together. Notwithstanding the efforts of the republicans to create dissension among the house democrats over the Tucker bill for the repeal of the obnoxious federal election laws, that bill was passed on schedule time and it received the votes of every democrat present.

The democratic congress has one opportunity to bring about a great reform, and at the same time save a very large sum of money, that should not be neglected.

It is a fact well known to all who have ever had any considerable business with the treasury department that there is an unnecessary amount of red tape in its method of dealing with accounts involving the expenditure of money.

The joint congressional committee now investigating the work and methods of the various departments will recommend that all of the bureaus of the treasury department, which handles all of the postoffice accounts, and which has long enjoyed the reputation of being conducted under a thorough business system, it is not duplicated, being of itself a final settlement of the accounts upon which it passes.

half. It would also show the people that democratic economy was being practiced as well as preached.
