TREES AS WINDBREAKS AND SHELTER BELTS

According to the Forest Service, trees as windbreaks have a distinct value to the ranchers of Oregon and Washington in the dry regions east of the Cascades.

In the dry sections east of the Cascades, where the trees must endure drought and frost, Lombardy poplar, Carolina poplar, Balm and Gilead, and perhaps box alder, are about the only trees that will thrive.

In its study of windbreaks, the forest service has compiled the following suggestions for those who wish to plant windbreaks or shelter belts: 1. Place the windbreak at right angles to the direction of the prevailing winds. 2. To obtain best results, from one-eighth to one-fifth of the farm should be devoted to this purpose.

3. Plant only such species as will form windbreaks, and are suited to the region and the locality. 4. Plant rapid growers for quick results; but underplant with slower growing species, which are longer lived and more valuable.

5. If protection in winter is wanted, supplement a hardwood windbreak with evergreens. 6. Separate the trees by the spacing proper to the species planted.

7. Make the windbreak thick from the bottom up, especially on the side toward the wind. This may be done using species which branch near the ground, by planting outside rows of low-growing trees, by encouraging natural reproduction, and by underplanting.

8. Cultivate the plantation thoroughly while it is young. 9. Do not allow excessive grazing where reproduction is desired.

10. Do not thin the windbreaks too heavily or take out the best trees for minor uses.

Remember that a timber tract should be improved by use, and that each clearing should leave it in better condition than before.
