GREAT CANNING INDUSTRY PREDICTED FOR OREGON

Director H. B. Miller Praises Quality of Oregon Fruit and Points Out Need of Many Plants.

University of Oregon, Eugene, Jan. 21.—An impressive statement of the the need of canneries and dryers in fruit communities of Oregon is made by H. B. Miller in an article in a recent issue of Better Fruit. Mr. Miller is director of the school of commerce of the State University, and is also organizer of the work of the industrial survey. He says in part:

"It has finally become a well-established fact that the Oregon Bartlett pear, although not quite so good for shipping in the fresh state, is fully equal, if not superior, to the pears produced anywhere in the world for canning purposes. Had this fact been made clear by the canneries of Oregon years ago, and the growers encouraged in that line of industry, Oregon would today be taking in immense quantities of money for canned pears.

"The Oregon canned pears are now pronounced in France and Great Britain to be especially fine. In fact, in our world survey of the fruit markets, we find it uniformly established wherever Pacific Coast carned goods find a market that they are pronounced thoroughly superior to the canned fruits from any other part of the world. The canneries now operated and maintained by Oregon people are proving that the Oregon Bartlett pear, the Oregon strawberry, gooseberry, blackberry and raspberry cannot be excelled, and in all of these lines prospects are excellent for an expansion in trade. The manager of the California Friut Canners' Association, C. H. Bentley, in his address before the California fruitgrowers' convention, pays high tribute to all of these Oregon products and wishes that in some of these things they would produce as good quality in California as we produce here. He pays a particularly high tribute to the Oregon strawberry and says that the markets will take great quantities of them. He pays equally high tribute to the Oregon goosberry.

"What is absolutely for the development of this industry in the northwest is the establishment of canneries and dryers owned and operated by the people of this territory with their produce marketed by an association permanently interested in the development of the industry. Securing a market for the by-products of the fruitgrowers, to my mind, should not be the central idea of the canning and drying and preserving industry. If this territory has the real natural advantages for the production of a high quality of fruits, berries and vegetables of certain types, it is of primary importance to put up a high quality of goods, to distribute them and establish a reputation for our canned pears, for our cherries, for our blackberries and raspberries, our string beans, our beets and other kinds of vegetables. We must make a reputation for a fine quality of dried fruits of all kinds which can produce to advantage, and when we have done this, when we have established canneries and dryers, and factories for producing jams, jellies and fruits in various forms of the finest quality, the by-product question will take care of itself. These plants will have no difficulty in handling the by-products after they have established a substantial reputation for all these various qualities of high-class fruits, berries and vegetables."
